The greater difficulty is commonly in the smaller towns. Take the States of Wisconsin, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas and Texas. In each of these States there are county-seat towns, where we have only ten to fifty communicants in each town. In some there are organized parishes. Our people would like to have a resident rector in their parish and maintain regular church services. In that same town there are from two to a dozen other religious bodies with whom they are in competition. If they raise as much as ten or twelve dollars per communicant for a rector's support, it is not sufficient in these days. Perhaps more money can be raised now than formerly, but the cost of living and other demands are greater. The small and weak parish becomes helpless under our present system. Many among us feel that it is an antiquated system which ought to be changed and modified.

In the large cities, too, some changes are needed. Large parishes there work independently of each other, and often in much competition and rivalry. Modern changes have affected them also. But it is more in small towns, in the country and in the missionary districts that some change is needed.

TO MEET THE COMING DAY.

Bishop Reese, of Georgia, in Convention Address.

* * * The present and the future absorb us. They exact our exclusive attention. They demand of us faith and courage and the spirit of self-denying responsiveness to the duty of the hour. The Church is on trial. We Christians are on trial. Do we realize the issue and are we capable of rising to the responsibilities of the hour? A complacent, comfortable religiousness is doomed. We must cast off sloth and indifference to the world-need for strength, comfort and regeneration. We must resolutely face the facts. We must think out their meaning. We must exercise our intelligent and consecrated ingenuity to find the sources of our weakness, and to discover and apply measures by which the Church and people of God may put His blessed Gospel of Light and Salvation into the ferment of the world's struggle, so that the result of all this travail and destruction may be a new and reconstructed world of righteousness and peace and justice to all nations and to all classes. When the war is ended (pray God, in victory to our cause), then the greater struggle will begin, to discipline into order the tremendous social forces which have been unloosed, to find a basis of sympathetic friendliness and understanding between the contending classes in society. We shall probably then face for the first time in history an unleashed democracy, worldwide in its sweep and aspiration. Amid all the turmoil and disruption, we must keep the faith, the faith in man, born of a real faith in God. The Church must become the friend of man more than she has been in the past. She must no longer sit intrenched in the fortresses of privilege and reaction. She must move on with the great currents of human striving and hope, without fear and without cowardice, to the new goal which democracy opens up before us. She must give sympathy and friendliness, seek to guide and restrain and yet aid the instincts of liberty and justice which are fermenting in human life and which are in their hopes and aims deeper and more far-reaching than the liberty which will be won by military victory over the forces of autocracy. So then, my brethren, let us as Christians and Churchmen turn our faces resolutely to the future to meet the grave duties and the high privilege of service to mankind which our Master lays on us. We must cast aside all minor issues of ecclesiastical and doctrinal differences. We must discriminate, and we must realize new standards of value in religion and life. We must measure in broader terms of human service the privilege and responsibilities of our Church. We must simplify our faith; we must deepen our religious character; we must make our zeal and activity more human and more attractive to men. We must convince them of the genuineness of our sympathy and love. We must convince them that we are Christian in our convictions, our feelings and our ideals. We must be less sectarian in spirit, more genuinely catholic to all interests and needs rightfully human. We must prove by our sacrifices that we love God and His Church and love our fellow-men, irrespective of their place in the classifications of an imperfect social order. We must think less of the things which concern our own happiness and more of the things which concern the happiness and well-being of our neighbors. We must seek the truth which will unite us and break down the walls of division which separate us. We must learn how to be true to our convictions, with sympathy and fairness to the convictions of others. We have a saying inherited from the past, "In essentials, unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity." That is a fine and worthy rule. We must translate it into life, more completely than we have heretofore done. And God save us from that hateful and soul-destroying sin which we condemn in our enemies, but which lies latent or patent in every human heart—supercilious pride in our own fancied superiority and cynical contempt for the assumed inferiority of those who walk not with us in Church or society. In other words, brethren, we must somehow come to know Christ better and become more Christ-like in our characters and conduct.

THE GREATER USE OF THE LAYMAN.

Extracts From a Paper Read Before the Archdeaconry of Newark.

By Rev. Charles T. Walkley.

We have been terribly afraid of the layman, thinking him incompetent, uninformed and unwilling, but the war has opened our eyes to the fact that thousands of our laymen were more competent to serve the spiritual emergency and made larger sacrifices for their religion than we have ever made.

I instance one man from my parish whom I knew to be "a jolly good fellow." He astounded me one day by asking for a recommendation to the Y. M. C. A. foreign service. He sacrificed a good salary, he gave himself at once. I never dreamed that he had even the inclination to do such a service. I wrote, in my utter inability to answer all the questions sent me, this: "A man who so beautifully cared for his mother in her last days, would be of great service abroad among men."

I am sure that the heads of the army in France knew vastly more about the use of laymen than I or the Church, for when they chose out two men from the thousands to do special work in the trenches, they chose my friend to be one of them.

To my mind we have been taught by the war how wonderful the average man is! How far beyond our accusing and scolding. He is our mystic, our poet, he is our patient laborer all the day in the vineyard. He has within his heart the finer things of life. He gives freely, he thinks deeply. He has the Church and his Christ very close to his heart. The layman has suddenly been revealed to us in all his inner glory. The war has transfigured him and we behold him in his beauty.

Perhaps this seems too strong a statement and yet we must again accept the testimony and witness of those who have seen our men face to face. Not in their Sunday spruceness, but in the ordeals of a thousand fears and terrors of the trenches with No Man's Land just before them.

How shall we use him? How shall we use the business man who has had a generation's experience in a few years of this war. I submit a few suggestions.

Use the layman's spiritual power in our worship, in his pew and with his spirit and voice. Let us recognize his spiritual power there. More reverence in the Church, deeper feeling of the prayers, wiser choice of hymns. The Y. M. C. A. has set us an excellent example in pitching hymn tunes in a key in which men can sing them. Not one of us here can join in the singing of hymns pitched high for boys' voices. A spiritual use of the prayers. I wonder at the layman who kneels at the throne of God and hears the hasty, impersonal and prayerless spirit of our reading of the prayers. I must recognize the spiritual power of the worshipper in the pew.

Use the layman in a larger way in the method of appeal. We are too apt to abuse our listeners, not use them. We attack rather than enlist them. We love to stir their resentment and too seldom win them to devotion. God forgive the man I heard preach just a week ago. I had a soldier and a sailor with me, there were many other enlisted men in the congregation. I felt as any right-minded layman should feel—that my Christianity had not been respected by the preacher. One of the ablest laymen in this Diocese confirmed my opinion. There is no more wonderful way of using our laymen than in careful, thoughtful preaching. Poorly prepared, hastily constructed and illy digested efforts of the eleventh hour Saturday nights are not worthy of the intelligent and thinking men of the congregation.

Let us use our laymen not as opportunities but as fellow-members in Christ in our services. To my mind all other activities are secondary. It takes no religious experience to usher, take up an offering, or run clubs and parish socials. It is very apt to be the case that parish-house activities are non-religious in their character and keep men from church.

Use the layman's spiritual experience. We ought to hear more of our men speak. Dr. Hamilton Mabie was a man of large power—his powers were at their greatest efficiency when he preached! Great was the company of the preachers, said the Psalmist. The larger use of the spiritual experiences of the laymen would make the house of God a new place.

The larger use of the fraternal instinct is another suggestion. Men seek the fraternal orders by the thousands and many of them are lost to the Church. They ought to find that fraternal spirit in our churches.

ACTIVITIES OF THE CHURCH WAR COMMISSION.

By the Secretary.

The Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney has been appointed Civilian Chaplain at Camp Hancock.

The Rev. J. Charles Harriman has recently been appointed First Lieutenant and Chaplain.

The Rev. C. H. B. Turner has been appointed Chaplain at Lewes in place of Rev. Earl W. Huckel,*resigned.

The Rev. Herman R. Page, of Spokane, Wash., has been commissioned as an Army Chaplain.

The Rev. Cyril B. Harris, recently Civilian Chaplain at Camp Hancock, has received an Army commission.

The Rev. Edmund J. Cleveland, who has an Army chaplaincy, has sailed.

The Rev. Francis Kinzer Little, of Rhinebeck, Army Chaplain, has sailed.

The Rev. William E. Patrick, of New Bedford, Mass., recently in the service of the Y. M. C. A., was sworn in on July 18th as Chaplain and First Lieutenant, National Army, Twenty-third Infantry, A. E. F.

The following Red Cross chaplains have recently sailed:

The Rev. Messrs. Everett P. Smith, of Portsmouth, R. I.; Rev. Perry G. M. Austin and Rev. Samuel B. Booth, of Philadelphia, Pa.

The following order has recently been issued from the Adjutant General's office:

"1. In view of the greatly increased number of chaplains authorized by recent legislation, and of the provisions now being made for the professional training of chaplains in their duties before appointment, it has been determined, as soon as the services of a sufficient number of additional chaplains become available, to bring to an end the present arrangement at camps and posts whereby privileges within the camps are granted to camp pastors of various denominations and to voluntary chaplains not members of the military establishment

"2. Camp and post commanders are instructed to bring this decision tactfully to the attention of any clergymen who are now acting either as camp pastors or as voluntary chaplains in their commands.

"3. An appropriate period, not to exceed three months, will be granted for such persons to complete the work that they now have in hand, and to make arrangements for leaving camps and posts.

"4. This shall not be construed to prevent chaplains on duty with organizations and at camps and posts, with the approval of their commanding officers, from inviting clergymen to conduct services or to assist therewith upon special occasions.

"5. In making public announcement at the camps and posts of this decision, attention should be called at the same time to the fact that plans are under way for bringing to the camps, for public addresses and private conferences, a number of men distinguished in their various professions (including clergy) whom officers and men will have an opportunity to hear upon the moral and spiritual factors of the war, and upon other subjects of fundamental interest."

By order of the Secretary of War.

At present the War Commission is unable to say how this order will be interpreted. As soon as it has discovered the course which the War Department is to take, and as soon as it has determined upon its own policy, it will communicate with you in regard to the civilian chaplains already in camps. We would earnestly advise all chaplains to continue working as heretofore until they receive further instructions from the War Commission.

Pensions: The War Commission desires, in response to numerous inquiries, to announce that it pays the pension assessments on behalf of the civilian chaplains appointed by it and working under its direction, unless those assessments are otherwise provided for. The Canon of the General Convention requires every organization of the Church which pays a salary to a clergyman to pay the pension assessments to the Church Pension Fund, and of course the War Commission complies with this Canon.

In addition, it may be mentioned that as a part of its war duties, the War Commission is also paying the pension assessments on behalf of those clergymen who are serving as privates or non-commissioned officers. The number of such clergymen is not very large.

Numerous requests have been received by the War Commission that it should also assume the payment of the pension assessments on behalf of the large number of clergymen who have commissions as chaplains in the Army and Navy, and on behalf of those clergymen who are serving as officers in the Army. The War Commission is taking this matter under careful consideration, but has not yet arrived at a decision. Probably the War Commission will take up each case of a commissioned chaplain or officer individually and pay the pension assessments in those cases where it would be a hardship for it not to do so, and where it is, by paying the pension assessments performing a patriotic duty. In the meantime all such commissioned chaplains and officers should attend personally to their pension assessments. It is gratifying to know that many parishes, whose clergy are at the front or on the way, are continuing to pay their pension assessments both as a patriotic contribution and as an additional mark of respect for those who are giving their lives in the service of their country.

The Shell.

Upon a mountain height, far from the sea,
I found a shell,
And to my listening ear the lonely thing
Ever a song of ocean seemed to sing,
Ever a tale of ocean seemed to tell.

How came the shell upon that mountain height?
Ah, who can say
"No load of woe
Need bring despairing frown;
Whether there dropped by some too careless hand,
Or thereon cast when Ocean swept the Land,
Ere the Eternal had ordained the Day?

Strange, was it not? Far from its native deep,
One song it sang—
Sang of the awful mysteries of the tide,
Sang of the misty sea, profound and wide—
Ever with echoes of the ocean rang.

And as the shell upon the mountain height
Sings of the sea,
So do I ever, leagues and leagues away—
So do I ever, wandering where I may—Sing, O my home! sing, O my home! of thee.

—Eugene Field.

Corporate Reunion.

One of the many blessings resulting from the present war will be a better understanding between Christian people. There has been a kindly and brotherly spirit manifested among the various religious bodies since the war began. This will greatly help to create an atmosphere of trust and goodwill which is needed before anything approaching organic union of the Church is possible.

Conferences with a view to reunion are being held in England and the United States, and much may come from them ultimately. Union cannot be effective and bear its true witness before the world, until there is beneath the spirit of oneness in interest and aim. There is at the present time, among the divergent sections of Christendom, a real agreement as to vital facts—e. g., as outlined in the primitive Creeds. Our divergences are historic and have woven themselves into our habits of thought, so that these are real difficulties to organic union. Reunion cannot be forced or hurried. There is no short cut to it. I am a Churchman, and I believe in the principles for which it stands. At the same time, I am all for corporate reunion, and I believe that the time is fast approaching when that which keeps us divided will be solved.

The situation is considered most promising on both sides. It is evident to all that the atmosphere is changing and things may soon be possible in reality, that could not have been imagined five years ago. May God hasten the time.—Bishop of Niagara.

I do not believe that death is to the dying the dreadful thing it looks to the beholders. I think it is more like what the spirit may then be able to remember of its own birth as a child into this lower world, this porch of the heavenly.—George Macdonald.

Church Intelligence

Missionary Education Movement Conference.

"Inspiration, Information, Recreation" was the keynote and watchword of the fourteenth annual Missionary Education Movement Conference held at College Camp on Lake Geneva this year, from July 26 to August 5. Ten days of prayer and conference among representatives from nearly every Protestant denomination, in the restful and peaceful environment of this ideal and beautiful spot on Lake Geneva, brought to all who were privileged to attend, new strength and a larger and broader vision for the tasks and duties which await them and which they will take up in their own church and community. Young men and women expecting to enter upon their life work were given a deeper and broader vision of life as it relates to God and their fellowmen. The great and vital world problems and movements of the day were thoroughly and ably discussed. All were brought nearer to God and their fellowman in learning to pray and praise in God's great out-of-doors, in private devotions and in public worship. Missionaries from China, Japan, South America, India and other parts of the world, who are at home on furloughs, told of the life and needs of those across the seas, and many were brought to realize for the first time how much alike after all is human nature in all lands and of all races and color, and that God is the great and loving Father of us all, and many will take back to their own churches and communities a broader vision and clearer understanding which will act as the leaven to awaken in others more interest and co-operation in helping to send the gospel to every creature. The call has come to some to give themselves, to help make these places fit places for God's children to live in and to teach them of the saving power of Jesus and His love. Missionaries and workers in our home land told of the conditions and needs of the mission fields in our own country and the lack of an adequate number of helpers to carry on the work in the best possible way, and many were inspired and determined to do their full part in the future and to try and bring to others some of the inspiration and information they have received. The noble and splendid work being done and the wonderful results accomplished by the Y. M. C. A. and others for our soldiers both at home and abroad, and those of our Allies and in the prison camps of the enemy, were made very real to all. There was plenty of time for rest, recreation and wholesome fun.

About two hundred and fifty persons attended the conference. About thirty-five of this number were Episcopalians, representing fourteen Dioceses. Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rev. C. C. Rollet, of Minneapolis, and the Rev. Mr. Milne, of Delevan, Wis., on the two Sundays of the conference. Mrs. Edna Biler, of the Church Missions House, New York, attended the conference to present the Advent Call to the Churchwomen present.

"Moral Aims" Fall Campaign.

The National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War is arranging for the resumption this fall on a wide scale of the speaking campaign in which fifty-five prominent ministers and laymen toured the country during April, May and June. Sir George Adam Smith, Principal of Aberdeen University, returned to his home in Scotland a few days ago; but two other noted British clergymen will be brought to America in September to take his place.

Through the American and British Departments of Public Information the National Committee has arranged tours for the Rt. Rev. Charles Gore, Bishop of Oxford, and the Rev. Arthur T. Guttery, minister of Primitive Methodist Church of Liverpool. Mr. Guttery spent several weeks during July and August with the American forces in France, and he will bring to this country the latest message from the American front at the second battle of the Marne.

Both Mr. Guttery and Bishop Gore, in their letters accepting the invitations to visit America, declared their sympathy with the principles governing all the speakers sent out by the National Committee. "I shall do my utmost," Mr. Guttery wrote, "to cement our alliance by emphasis on those moral aims that are the sanction of our war and the surest pledge of victory."

The Bishop of Oxford wrote as follows:

"I am very keen about getting religious people of all kinds to throw themselves into pressing forward the idea of a League of Nations, leaving it, of course, to the politicians to settle the details, but asserting the principle.

"No one is more clear than I am as to the moral necessity of entering upon this awful war and of fighting it through; but I am exceedingly anxious that the moral aim in all this should be kept clearly to the front: and I fear that as the war goes on there is more and more necessity that great efforts should be made to secure this. The mere determination to beat Germany is apt to absorb all else. Whereas, in fact we might defeat Germany and at the same time absorb so much of what is false in the spirit of the war as to defeat our professed aims in entering upon it. That is what makes me ready to do anything that lies in my power to keep the right moral principles of the war to the fore."

The fifty-five speakers who traversed the country from Maine to California under the auspices of the National Committee in April, May and June addressed 270 conferences of clergymen and 211 popular mass meetings, aggregating 16,060 ministers and 180,000 laymen.

The Third Synod of the Province of the Pacific will be held in Trinity Church, Seattle, Wash., from Thursday, September 5, to Sunday, 8, inclusive.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew of Christ Church, Charlottesville, is anxious to get in touch with all Church boys in the camp located there, and would like to have the names and addresses sent either to the Brotherhood or to the rector of the church, the Rev. W. Roy Mason.

Union Services: Most of the churches in Charlottesville have united and are having open air vesper services during August. A very large congregation attended the first service, which was held Sunday night, August 4.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Dr. Lay Leaves Raleigh.

This week, after a service of eleven years, the Rev. George W. Lay, D. D., relinquishes his rectorship at St. Mary's School, Raleigh. During his rectorship St. Mary's has grown to be the largest girls' school in our Church in this country. The grounds have been put in fine shape, the corps of teachers increased, and three buildings erected. Dr. Lay has not confined his interest solely to his school, but has been one of the most useful and influential citizens of his city. He has helped materially to raise the standards of education in the State. Dr. Lay is an unusually fine administrator, being accounted one of the best business men in Raleigh, and is in addition a splendid preacher. Mrs. Lay has been of great assistance to him, her talents receiving recognition in repeated re-election to the presidency of the active Raleigh Woman's Club. The Rev. Warren W. Way, of Salisbury, takes over the rectorship of St. Mary's in succession to Dr. Lay.

Union Services: During the months of July and August union services have been held in Raleigh on the capital grounds. Nearly all of the churches of the city have joined the movement, and it is estimated that congregations numbering as many as 2,000 assemble for these services. The ministers of the churches uniting in the plan each take one Sunday night. Prayers are said, familiar hymns sung and a short sermon delivered. The movement has proved most popular in Raleigh. The preaching is done from an automobile placed at a convenient situation. The congregation sits upon the grass, or bring their own chairs and cushions. The services are held at 8 P. M. It is believed that such services will be made permanent for the hot months.

KANSAS.

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

News Items of Interest.

The Bishop is taking a much-needed rest of two months in Canada. Some of the clergy are also taking a rest: The Rev. O. E. Hawke, Possons, is in the Ozark Mountains; the Rev. J. H. Harvey, of Pittsburg, is in Alabama.

The Rev. H. L. Virden, rector of Grace Church, Winsfield, is the Chaplain at Camp Funston, succeeding the Rev. Otis Gray, who is over seas.

There will be a meeting of the Southeast Convocation at Chanute on September 11, when plans will be perfected for an Every-Member Canvass in the Convocation.

A brass alms basin was blessed at Grace Church, Chanute, recently, in memory of the Rev. George H. Mullen. It was given by his wife.

The minister of the colored Methodist Church at Chanute has requested the rector of Grace Church, the Rev. R. Y. Barber, to start a teachers' training class in the Methodist Church. The class has been started under the leadership of Miss Nellie Smith, supervisor of the Grace Church Sunday school training class. Miss Smith has just returned from the Racine Conference, where she did class work.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Woodcock, who is spending some time at his summer home, Leland, Michigan, has been ill and under the care of a physician. He writes that he is now greatly improved, and in a few days expects to be restored to his usual health.

The Rev. C. E. Buxton, who has been in charge of St. Mary's Church at Madisonville, ever since he was ordained to the priesthood, has resigned charge of that parish and also the work at Uniontown, and accepted a call to work in the Diocese of Virginia. His leaving the Diocese will be a distinct loss to it. The work he was doing had shown steady progress in a most difficult field, and it will be hard to fill his place.

The Rev. Alexander Miller has not been able to take up his work at St. Thomas' Mission, Louisville, to which he was appointed by the Bishop. Mr. Miller has been suffering from a nervous breakdown, which has incapacitated him for work. It is expected he will be able to begin his duties early in September. In the meantime some of the Clergy at the Chaplains' Training School have generously given their assistance, and the services have been kept up without interruption.

The Rev. Clinton S. Quin, Bishop-Coadjutor-elect of the Diocese of Texas, spent part of his vacation in July with relatives in Louisville. The families of both Mr. Quin and also of his wife reside in Louisville, and Mr. Quin was a member of St. Andrew's Church when he entered the Seminary. His elevation to the Bishopric is a source of intense pride to his legion of friends in Louisville. His ability to fully meet the requirements of this exalted position are conceded without question.

The Rev. John R. Lewis, who has been in charge of the Colored Mission of the Church of the Good Shepherd at Hopkinsville, has accepted a call to the Diocese of Georgia, and will leave to take up his work in that Diocese on September 1.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

War Work of Girls' Friendly Society.

Various activities of the Girls' Friendly Society in the Diocese of New York are being continued during the summer. Many branches are open for meetings. Through the kindness of Miss Chapin in allowing her school to be used again this season by our girls, Red Cross work, classes in French, lectures on current events have attracted large numbers of girls. There are recreation evenings and Saturday night dances with soldiers and sailors. The large yard of the school is a cool and attractive place for gatherings of young people. The war work of the Girls' Friendly shows itself in many branches of the Red Cross, with an auxiliary of the New York Chapter at headquarters now in Miss Chapin's School. Many of the girls belong to the Girls' Patriotic Service League and the society is represented in the War Camp Community Service by a Secretary at New Rochelle, another Secretary will soon be sent to a nearby town, this last being made possible by assistance from the War Commission of the Church.

The Advent call of the Woman's Auxiliary has received the formal co-operation of the Girls' Friendly Society. The Girls' Friendly as an organization deciding to take part in this great call to united prayer during the first week in Advent. Miss Warren has kindly promised to address the girls on this subject September 24, 1918.

The Trustees for the Anglican Library of the Society for the Home Study of Holy Scripture and Church History wish to extend and enlarge the work of the library collected by the late Miss Sarah Frances Smiley. The Trustees feel the only fitting memorial to the great life work of Miss Smiley is the continuation, perpetuation and endowment of the library and its work. We, therefore, make a very earnest appeal to all the old graduates, students and friends of the S. H. S. H. S. and Miss Smiley that they will continue and increase their support and interest in the society and its work.

The courses of instruction are being revised and extended and we hope to have various branches of the library in different Dioceses circulating from secretaryships in connection with the instruction papers, the sections moving annually. We have, at present, three courses under revision—the New Testament under the Rev. Dr. Burton Scott Easton, D. D., of the Western Theological Seminary, Chicago; the Old Testament under the Rev. S. A. D. Mercer, D. D.; and the Church History and Russian Library sections under the Rev. Professor Leicester C. Lewis, the Western Theological Seminary. The whole of the revision of the library and its work is under the guidance of Bishop Mathews, of New Jersey, and Bishop Johnson, of Colorado, Dean Fosbrook, of the General Theological Seminary, and the Rev. Arthur W. Jenks, D. D. Besides these courses of instruction, courses on any branch of religious instruction can be outlined and lists of books supplied to readers, and books will be circulated from the library to members.

Subscriptions on the endowment and for membership should be sent to

Mrs. Harlan Cleveland,

Treasurer, 125 East Thirty-eighth Street, New York.

Speak low to me, my Saviour, low and sweet,

From out the hallelujahs, sweet and low,

Lest I should fear and fall and miss Thee so,

Who art not missed by any that entertain."

—Mrs. Browning.

Personal Notes

Thé Rt. Rev. James H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop of Harrisburg, and the Rt. Rev. John N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop of Western Michigan, are the two Bishops appointed to represent the American Church at the Canadian Synod, which meets in Toronto, Canada, on September 7.

The Rev. C. H. Jordan, rector of the Church of the Advent, Williamston, N. C., and Hamilton, N. C. (Diocese of East Carolina), has resigned. The resignation will take effect December 31.

The Rev. C. S. McClellan, Jr., rector at Christ Church, Baltimore, Maryland, who during his year of most excellent service there has been very active in the work of the parish, his efforts including a wonderful work among the soldiers and sailors of the cantonments and training camps, will take up his new duties at Marfa, Texas, in September.

The Rev. W. A. Bruce has entered upon his duties as locum tenens at Holy Trinity Church, Nashville, Tenn., and should be addressed at Ewing Avenue and High Street.

The Rev. Guy H. Frazer has accepted the call to become rector of the Church of Our Saviour, and St. Paul's Mission, Rock Hill, S. C.

The Rev. James C. Mitchener, on account of ill health, has been compelled to resign the charge of the Church of the Holy Cross, Mt. Pleasant, Tenn., and is at present at Gallatin, Tenn.

The Rev. William P. Peyton, rector of St. John's Church, City Point, Va., has enlisted for work with the Y. M. C. A. in France and expects to leave shortly for his new work.

The Rev. Thomas Semmes, rector of Meade Memorial Church, South Richmond, Va., has declined the call recently extended him to become rector of St. Thomas Church, Orange, Va.

The Rev. Peerce N. McDonald, of Trinity Church, Morgantown, West Virginia, who for the past three months has been located at Norfolk and working as a civilian chaplain under the War Commission, has resigned his position. He goes on August 23 to Louisville, Ky., to enter the School for Chaplains for the United States Army, which is held at Camp Taylor.

It is the little children that save the world—save it from its worldliness, its selfishness, its hardness of heart. That God sent them in their innocence and simplicity to make us pure and simple—that He sends them generation after generation—is not that, after all, quite as weighty and hopeful a fact as man's lordship over the beasts of the field, and the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea? Was not David right in regarding "babes and sucklings" as one of God's greatest gifts to the race, a gift full of Divine promise and hope? Are they not "a stronghold" for our thoughts, our affections, our pious trust in God, when our hearts are fretted with cares and hardened with regrets?—Samuel Cox.

INTERDENOMINATIONAL MISSION CONFERENCE.

The sixteenth annual conference of the Missionary Education Movement of the United States and Canada met at Blue Ridge, N. C., and had a most successful session.

Seven Protestant churches were represented, the delegates coming from almost all of the eleven Southern States.

This conference corresponds for the South to Silver Bay in the North, and delegates from Episcopal churches and enthusiastic support than it has received in the past.

This year there were thirty-eight delegates for Episcopal churches and Sunday schools, a number which exceeded those from any other denomination.

The spirit of unity and co-operation which prevailed at all the meetings was most encouraging, and inspired those in attendance to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

Our Church was represented on the program by speakers of such national reputation as Drs. Sturges, Mitman and Patton.

Practically every phase of missionary effort and Church and Sunday school work was discussed by experts, and the delegates will carry back to their respective fields of labor new and high ideals and instruction in the most modern and efficient methods.

GREAT GAIN IN NATIONAL EFFICIENCY AS RESULT OF WARTIME LIQUOR RESTRICTIONS.

LONDON, Aug. 6.—The gain in national efficiency is so great as a result of the wartime liquor restrictions that it is certain Great Britain never will return to pre-war conditions in this regard, according to a statement made to the Associated Press today by Baron D'Abernon, Chairman of the Central Board of Control, which has to deal with the drink problem. Baron D'Abernon said:

"The regulations limiting the hours of sale, providing for the dilution of spirits and beer, and forbidding treating, have resulted in remarkable decreases in drunkenness and the diseases incidental to drinking. The level of drunkenness today is about half that of a year ago, when it was one-third that of the pre-war time. There has been a general decrease of about 83 per cent. in drinking among both men and women."

The above is clipped from the New York Times, a metropolitan paper which is not in favor of nation-wide prohibition, although it is difficult to see how it can stand in opposition when it carries such news items as this.

CONSERVATION REACHES SING SING.

The following item shows that the conservation of man power reaches a good deal further back than the firing line and that the New York State Penitentiary is now taking practical steps efficiently to reform its inmates:

On arriving in Sing Sing as a new prisoner you are measured, weighed, photographed and duly registered, and later, after the doctor has made a careful inventory of your physical attractions, you are conducted to the office of the school, where the newcomer is made to feel at home by the considerate manner of his reception, and after being assigned to a class he is told when to report for his lessons. A staff of inmate teachers, selected from the best men in the prison, many of whom are qualified by university training, are in charge of the different class-rooms graded to accommodate the students whose attendance is required. Each scholar has to spend at least one hour every day in the class-room, and he soon learns that the State of New York, through Professor Crowley and his teaching force, means business when it comes to "injecting knowledge."—Sing Sing Star-Bulletin.

THE SOULS OF OUR BOYS.

According to the account of Raymond D. Fosdick, Chairman of the Commission of Training Camp Activities of the War Department, we have no need to worry about the morals of our boys in France.

In a recently published article he makes the following interesting statements, which are sure to be comforting to every mother, wife or sister who has a loved one abroad:

"The Young Men's Christian Association is doing an astonishing piece of work. It is a new Y. M. C. A. that one sees in France, and any one acquainted with the spirit of the organization a decade ago will rub his eyes at the transformation. From a sectarian society of somewhat narrow traditions it has become in France an agency of social service on a broad, comprehensive basis. On General Pershing's invitation it is running the entire Post Exchange system for the troops, and its stores are to be found practically wherever a unit of troops is located.

"I should like to take this opportunity to remove a misapprehension about the Y. M. C. A. which has gained considerable ground, not only with our fellows abroad, but with the people back home, and that is that the Y. M. C. A. is making money out of the canteens which it is operating for the forces. At General Pershing's request I went into this matter thoroughly, and the report is absolutely without foundation. I mention this matter only because the widespread rumor is most unfair to an organization which is doing heroic service.

"Somewhat to my surprise I found the Salvation Army probably the most popular organization in France with the troops. It has not undertaken the comprehensive program which the Y. M. C. A. has laid out for itself. That is, it is operating only in three or four divisions, while the Y. M. C. A. is aiming to cover every unit of troops. But its simple, homely, unadorned service seems to have touched the hearts of our men. The aim of the organization is, if possible, to put a worker and his wife in a canteen, or a centre. The woman spends her time making doughnuts and pies and sews on buttons. The man makes himself generally useful in any way in which his service can be applied. I saw such places in dugouts way up at the front, where the German shells screamed over our heads with a sound not unlike a freight train crossing a bridge. Down in their dugouts the Salvation Army folks imperceptibly handed out doughnuts and dished out the drinks."

Mr. Fosdick was asked about the morals of the troops.

"I suppose you mean 'morals' in the narrow sense," he said. "I saw our troops storm Vaux on July 1; I saw the marines holding the line at Chateau-Thierry early in June, and I have seen the conditions under which our fellows habitually live in the trenches at the front. Somehow, after what I have seen, I have not much patience with those people back home who fret about the morals of our army. For in a big sense our fellows are living on a plane such as men seldom attain. In point of devotion, unselfishness, cheer under hardship, a sense of honor, and a spirit of fortitude and courage, they make the people who piously condemn their morals back home look small and mean.

"Even in the narrowest interpretation of the word, we have little cause to worry about the morals of our men. The official statistics show that the venereal disease rate in the American Expeditionary Forces is less than 1 per cent. This is better than the conditions here in the camps at home, and it is infinitely smaller than the prevailing disease rate in the civilian population of the United States. As far as drunkenness is concerned, I saw thousands of American troops under all conditions, both at the front and in the rear, and I did not see a single man intoxicated.

"I do not want to give the impression that our men with the American Expeditionary Forces are saints—they are not. They are human fellows, and even when out of the trenches are living a life of which we Americans back home can well be proud. As a matter of fact, it is not a question of whether our fellows overseas are worthy of us and our traditions. The question is whether we are worthy of them."

Courage.

You may be well educated, a college graduate, leading your class; you may have influence, pull, a fine personality, a father to push you, but you may lack courage. And lacking that you will lack everything, for everything worth while in life depends upon courage. There never was a time when courage was so necessary as to-day. It is as imperative for those at home as for the soldiers at the front. Not even honesty can take the place of courage. It is the backbone of the stamina, of character. A man is a jellyfish without it. Cultivate your courage, and take it with you wherever you go.—Dr. O. S. Marden.

Twelfth Sunday After Trinity: God gives and forgives, but both through Jesus Christ our Lord. That sums up with a fair degree of completeness the whole teaching of this day in lessons and in Collect, Epistle and Gospel. In saying this, however, we must not fail to do justice to the Old Testament, in which God both gives and forgives. St. John's statement that "the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John 1:17), and St. Paul's constant contrasting of the Gospel with the law have, perhaps, somewhat blinded us to the fact that there were grace and some truth even in the Old Covenant. That the law was a schoolmaster to bring us Christ through its disciplinary power does not exhaust the Old Covenant as a preparation for the New. God gave earthly blessings before He gave heavenly ones; and He was gracious and forgiving even under the law. Both these characteristics of God are brought out in the first lesson for Sunday morning. Supplementing the Covenant that God made with the children of Israel at Sinai (see Deut. 29:1), was the promise that after they had gotten possession of the land and had sinned and been carried away into exile, they would then, if penitent, be forgiven and restored. It is an Old Testament revelation both of the grace and of the truth of God; a promise of forgiveness and a plea for obedience. Under the latter head the great Law Giver urges: "This commandment is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven nor beyond the sea, but nigh thee; in thy mouth and in thy heart" verses 11-13). It is this feature of the Divine law that St. Paul seizes on as a point of agreement between the law and the Gospel and as fulfilled in our Lord Jesus Christ in a passage used for the second lesson. "The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart; that is, the word of faith, which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Romans 10:4-10). Thus the law itself was, as to its true inwardness, a Gospel of faith; and the same thing is true of the moral law written in men's hearts. This, however, required a Christ for its realization and a ministry for its propagation; which must be a ministry of the spirit, not of the letter. (Compare Epistle for the day and Rom. 10:14, 15.)

The New Testament lesson was selected to bring out this same central truth of the necessity of Christ. "All things are delivered unto me of my Father; and no man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him. Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest"; the rest that "Is not quitting the busy career, But the fitting of self to its sphere."

Hence, "Take my yoke upon you (the best means of pulling a load) and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart." The Old Testament selection in part matches our Lord's denunciation of His contemporaries and in part the blessings promised to the obedient: "the meek shall increase their joy in the Lord."

On Being Cheerful.

A sunny disposition is a work of art rather than a gift of nature. The raw materials for cheerfulness lie all around us like the colors the artist combines in his painting. It is for us to recombine them. To achieve a serene point of view is just a matter of selection. One becomes a proficient optimist in the same way that one becomes a proficient story-teller. He selects and works over the things that produce the effect he designs; what conflicts with the effect he ignores or treats only as shading.

How any one can deliberately elect to look on the dark side of things, except as a pose, an attitude, a sort of gloomy smartness, passes the understanding. An ugly or despondent temper is as inartistic as a deliberately ugly painting or a dull and repulsive story, and you come by it in somewhat

Almighty and everlasting God, who art always more ready to hear than we to pray, and art wont to give more than either we desire or deserve; Pour down upon us the abundance of Thy mercy; forgiving us those things whereof our conscience is afraid, and giving us those good things which we are not worthy to ask, but through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

the same manner. It is a matter of deliberate selection. Now and then a misanthrope gives his own bile concrete embodiment by erecting a building designed to worry his neighbors through the sheer malice of its ugliness. There is as little justification for a sour disposition as there is for such a manifestation of it. It involves a degree of perverse premeditation.

There is a wealth of comfort in the old maxim, "The world is wide." This is simply to say that it offers a limitless field for selection. If one fact is black, another is bright. If a friend is false, somewhere true friends are awaiting your coming. To sit in a dark corner while bright life is everywhere about you; to brood over a sorrow, a slight, a privation, when a multitude of good and generous and hopeful deeds illustrates the life of the world; to rage at the limitations of your own estate when you can make your spirit sympathetically master of everything—this is to declare an indolent and wallowing spirit. It is a form of voluntary servitude to the powers of darkness.—New York Mail.

The family altar may well be considered as a breakwater to check the onward rush of the ocean of worldliness that threatens to engulf the Christian home of today, and leave a snug harbor, with calm waters for the family ark to float upon. The rush of business, the call of the world, the multiplied amusements that allure, the many social appointments, the outside religious duties, the unusual stress and strain that every family feels in the riot and whirl of modern life, threaten to wash away every vestige of religion from the home. The presence of the family altar would certainly have a restraining influence against the encroachments of the world and make the home a calm and quiet shelter for the religious life.—Christian Intelligencer.

"The business of the Sunday school is not the imparting of facts, even though they be Biblical facts, but the leading of lives. Success demands an understanding of the life, the nature and the needs of the pupil (psychology), of the principles of teaching (pedagogy), of the principles of the organization and management of the modern Sunday school, and of God's Word; but the Bible is the means to an end, and not the end in itself—the end is fullness of life in Christ Jesus."

"We've Always Been Provided For."

"Good wife, what are you singing for? You know we've lost the hay; And what we'll do with horse and kye, is more than I can say; While, like as not, with storm and rain, we'll lose both corn and wheat." She looked up with a pleasant face, and answered low and sweet, "There is a heart, there is a hand, we feel but cannot see; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be."

He turned around with sudden gloom; she said: "Love, be at rest; You cut the grass, worked soon and late, you did your very best. That was your work; you've naught at all to do with wind and rain; And do not doubt, but you will reap rich fields of golden grain; For there's a heart and there's a hand we feel, but cannot see; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be."

"That's like a woman's reasoning; 'we must because we must.'" She softly said: "I reason not; I only work and trust. The harvest may redeem the hay; keep heart, whatever betide; When one door shuts, I've always seen another open wide, There is a heart, there is a hand, we feel, but cannot see; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be."

He kissed the calm and trustful face; gone was his restless pain; She heard him with a cheerful step go whistling down the lane, And went about her household tasks, full of a glad content, Singing to time her busy hands, as to and fro she went: "There is a heart, there is a hand, we feel, but cannot see; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be."

Days come and go. Thanksgiving time—and the great fire burned clear; The farmer said: "Dear wife, it's been a good and happy year; The fruit was gain, the surplus corn has bought the hay, you know." She lifted then a smiling face, and said: "I told you so, For there's a heart, and there's a hand, we feel, but cannot see; We've always been provided for, and we shall always be."

The Waiting Flax.

"Get thy spindle and thy distaff ready, and God will send the flax." Grandmother quoted that often to Polly in Polly's first year home from college. The two had always been chums, and college had made no difference.

It was a hard year—that first year at home. Polly had come back eager to go into settlement work. But Mr. and Mrs. Enlow both objected. Polly had been away four years—now she owed the home something, they said. So Polly went down to the settlement twice a week for club work, but that was all.

"I don't know how to get my spindle and distaff ready any more than I have," she protested to her grandmother. "I did that at college, and they're both getting rusty for want of use."

"Maybe that flax is getting dusty, too, waiting for somebody to discover it," grandmother retorted.

"Why, Grandma Armstrong! What do you mean?" Polly cried.

But grandmother only smiled. "You look very pretty in that new suit. Were you waiting for me to say so?"

Polly's face fell. "It's the Bristow's tea. I have teas. But I expect mother's waiting."

"Keep a watch for the flax," grandmother called after her.

The "tea" was a confusion and babel of voices. In the midst of it Eloise Bristow brought us a stranger. "Polly, I want you to meet Miss Granger, who is from Chicago. I hope she is going to like us." And Eloise fluttered off to the next guest.

Miss Granger looked at Polly. "Isn't it a farce?" she remarked.

"What? Eloise? She's a dear," Polly retorted, in warm defense.

Miss Granger shook her head. "Certainly not. I said 'it.' Everything. All life."

"Certainly not!" Polly echoed, now hotly indignant. "It's great. Even," with a conceding smile, "in spite of teas."

"Would you mind telling me," Miss Granger asked, "what you find great about it?"

"Rosie Vane, for one thing," Polly replied promptly. And she told of Rosie, little tired shopgirl, who bravely supported a family of four. From Rosie she went on to others in the club until sudden in confusion, she realized how long she had been talking, and began to apologize.

"Don't," Miss Granger answered, "It's the first real thing I've heard in weeks. Maybe I'll drop in at the settlement some day."

Three days later, Polly received a note from her pastor; he had known her all her life.

"Polly," he wrote, "how did you do it? I have been trying all winter to interest Miss Granger—and failed. She is one of the 'poor rich'; she has money, talent, everything to make life worth while, but she was letting it all rust away, and making herself and every one about her unhappy. Now I have hope of her. Keep the good work up; you cannot put your enthusiasm to any greater service than kindling fires on cold hearts."

Polly looked up with startled eyes. The flax had been waiting, after all.—Selected.

For the Southern Churchman.
In Their Last Hour.

N. B. Turner.

The last words of dying men have always been surcharged with interest for the rest of the world. Sometimes they are cherished chiefly for sentiment's sake, sometimes they seem to sound the keynote of the speaker's whole personality; always uttered as they are on the very threshold of mystery, they thrill and stimulate our human curiosity. For whatever reason, the dying words of a man mean a great deal. Especially is this true with regard to famous men—people who, having set their ineradicable stamp for good or evil on this world, turn at the very door of another to commit themselves for the last time. From days immemorial the deathbed utterances of celebrities have been recorded and compiled. Needless to say, they make curious reading.

The following "last words," culled from widely different sources, furnish a striking commentary on the many strange variations in human nature and human character. But when we have pondered them well we find one outstanding fact that is very significant: in nearly every case the farewell words are consistently in keeping with the life and deeds of the speaker. In the final hour the ruling passion still rules.

The French Revolutionist Desmoulin halted on the scaffold to proclaim himself once again. "Behold," he said, "the recompense reserved for the first apostle of liberty!" Cavour, the Italian patriot, exclaimed, "Brothers, brothers, the free Church and the free State!" Said Thomas a Becket as he fell, slain, at the altar of Canterbury Cathedral, "For the defense of the Church I am willing to die." William Henry Harrison, President of the United States, said: "I wish you to understand the true principles of government. I wish them carried out. I ask no more." John C. Calhoun cried, "The South, the South! God knows what will become of her!" Poor Mary of England—Bloody Mary—at the very end knew no remorse for her atrocious record. Instead, she wept bitterly over the loss of England's great fortress: "When I am dead you will find Calais written on my heart." Beethoven, the great musician, voiced, in his last moments, the particular longing of his life. He said, "I shall hear in Heaven."

Occasionally the list of last words shows strange contrasts. Oliver Cromwell said to those about him, "I desire to make what haste I may to be gone"; Queen Elizabeth cried with her last breath, "All my possessions for one moment of time!" Here and there we find a bitter soul falling back on irony at the last: "You can show my head to the people," Danton laughed, to his executioner. "It will be well worth the display." Often the dying man or woman, though ready to go, clings with one hand, as it were, to some beloved thing of life. Queen Victoria died during the Boer War, with which she was never in sympathy, and her expiring prayer was, "O, that peace may come!" Margaret of Valois breathed, "Farewell and remember me." Jane Taylor, the beloved writer for young people, questioned wistfully at the end, "Are we not children, all of us?" Thomas Jefferson said, "I commend my soul to God and my daughter to my country." On the other hand, frequently there is merely the stark expression of perfect submission. George Washington said, "It is well." Alice Cary, "I want to go away." John Quincy Adams' final words were, "It is the last of earth. I am content."

The contrast between the dying words of Christians and those of unbelievers can need no comment. It bears silent and irrefutable witness to the power of the faith of God. "O, my poor soul, whither art thou going?" exclaimed Emperor Hadrian, when he faced the last enemy. Mary, the wife of William the Third of England, remonstrated with the weeping bishop who read the Church's prayers at her side: "My Lord, why do you not go on? I am not afraid to die." Albert, Prince Consort, said: "I have had wealth, rank, power, but if these were all how wretched I should be." Thomas Paine, dying, replied to the question, Do you wish to believe that Jesus is the Son of God, "I have no wish to believe on that subject." Another famous atheist shrinking at the last from his own terrible creed, groaned, "I am taking a fearful leap in the dark." Frances Willard said, "How beautiful to be with God!"

Now and then we catch in deathbed utterances a meaning we dare not deny. An ecstatic word, a single simple phrase shows us that the passing soul sees and hears things hid from our mortal sense. Elizabeth Barrett Browning cried as her spirit took flight, "It is beautiful!" Felicia Hemans said, "I feel as if I were sitting with Mary at the feet of my Redeemer." Hannah More uttered one glad monosyllable, "Joy." Another woman author told her mourning friends, "I hear beautiful voices, and the children's are the loudest." An aged believer, passing away on a dark midnight in a room from which he had banished the lamp, pointed suddenly to the black east: "See," he cried, "Dawn!"

Two passages—for they may so be called—written centuries apart, but each representative of its author, set forth strikingly man's different attitude toward death and immortality. One is the work of a pagan soul hesitating and fumbling before the great mystery:

Soul of me, floating and flitting and fond,
Thou and this body were homemates together:
Wilt thou be gone, now, and whither?
Pallid and naked and cold,
Not to laugh, not to be glad as of old.

The other is Benjamin Franklin's epitaph, written by himself. It has a whimsical touch that appears to border on levity until one reads between the lines its golden faith and assurance:

The body of Benjamin Franklin, Printer (like the cover on an old book, its contents torn out, and strip of its lettering and gilding), lies here, food for worms. Yet the work itself shall not be lost, for it will, as he believed, appear once more, in a new and more beautiful edition, corrected and amended by The Author.

"Lest We Forget."

"The shouting and the tumult dies—
The captains and the kings depart—
Still stands Thine ancient sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart,
Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget."

dead who have nobly died, and the host of the living who with a just and common sense and love of honor have sent them forth to die. Lest we forget that we and our allies have not been above reproach; that there were signs of decadence among us—in the growing love of ease and idleness, in the tango dance of literature and lust, in the exaltation of pleasure, in a very definite degeneration of our moral fiber.

Lest we forget that our spirit is being purified in the furnace of war and the shadow of death. Do you remember the protest of those poets when some unclean plays were sent to the battle front for their entertainment?

"We are not pigs"—that was the message they sent back.

Lest we forget that the spirit of man has been lifted up out of the mud and dust of the battle lines, out of the body tortured with pain and weariness and vermin, out of the close companionship of the dead into high association on the bloody altar of liberty and sacrifice.

Lest we forget that the spirit of our own boys shall be thus lifted up, and our duty to put our house in order and make it a fit place for them to live in when they shall have returned to it from battle field swept, as a soldier has written, by the cleansing winds of God.—Irving Bacheller.

"And I Heard a Voice."

K. L. C.

As I lay on my bed of suffering,

All weary and worn with pain,
Afar from the hearts that loved me,

I held out my arms in vain
For one who must surely be near me,
Although she had passed from my ken.

Then I slept, and once more awaking

From the peace that my slumber gave,
I heard a whisper beside me,

Low in my ear—"Be brave,"

And again, half breathed and half spoken,
Sweet in my ear, "Be brave."

If God sends ministering angels

When danger and dark are near,
When peril and pain are upon us,

Why may not our lost and dear
Descend for awhile from their glory
To comfort and help us here?

Inside and Outside Crowds.

"No," said David Donaldson with decision, "I won't go into the Church. You're all right yourself, Fred. If Church members were all like you, it would be different. But I can't stand the hypocrites you've got in with you. Look across the street; there goes Dr. Jamison—a long-faced, praying scoundrel, and every one knows it. I'd rather stay on the outside than associate with such men."

At the next corner his companion turned. "Let's go down Fort Street," he suggested.

David drew back. "What for?" he ejaculated. "That's not an agreeable walk, if you ask me."

"O, just a little way. We've plenty of time."

In silence they walked two or three blocks. Then they came to the worst place in all the hideous length of Fort Street. A drunken woman staggered from a crumbling shed marked "Saloon." Two men were brawling loudly on the corner. Little children playing at marbles were fighting and swearing as the game went on. A coarse-voiced man was beating a decrepit horse because it could not pull its heavy load.

The young men walked silently along, and their faces showed the disgust they felt. At last Fred waved his hand toward the street, abounding with its unclean life. "Dave," he said, "I like you; you're a good fellow. If every one outside the Church were like you, I might stay out myself. Perhaps I could be as good a Christian out as in. But I can't stand the rest of your bunch. Look at those men and women, those children. Dave, I haven't much use for your outside set. They are low; they are indecent; they are—inhuman. You are all right, but I can't stand that part of your crowd."

David turned upon his friend in anger. Was he to be thrown in with that riffraff? Then he paused. After all, was his friend Fred, a genuine, sincere Christian, to be counted in with the hypocrites inside the Church? He laid his hand on his friend's arm and smiled. "Your point is well taken, old chap," he said. "If you put it that way, I admit that in spite of your hypocrites you people inside the Church have got the best of us outside. I'll go with you next Sunday.—The Youth's Companion.

Saved By a Lamb.

A touching incident is related by the venerable Paster Funke in his charming sketches of travel: "In the month of August, 1865, I was one of a party of tourists who set out to visit the Cathedral of Werden. When we arrived we found the door locked, and we had to wait till it was opened.

"When the sacristan's wife, who was quite absorbed in weeding her little vegetable garden, was at last induced to go for the great key, we had nothing to do but to examine the majestic architecture of the outside of the church. Looking up, we perceived, at the top of a high tower, the figure of a lamb, sculptured in stone. We were observing it with interest and surprise when our guide returned, bringing the large key. Her wrinkled face looked like a chronicle; and, hoping that she knew the history of her cathedral, we pointed to the sculptured lamb, and asked why it was placed at the top of the tower.

"We had touched a long familiar string. At once her interest and eloquence were awakened.

"Ah, gentlemen, you are looking at the lamb. Long years ago a tiler, occupied in repairing the roof, stood where that stone lamb now stands. Suddenly the rope which held the scaffolding broke and the man fell from that great height. Everyone who saw him fall expected only to find his corpse, for the church was surrounded by large, sharp stones, collected for the repairs. They were sure that the poor man would be dashed to pieces. What was their surprise when they saw him get up without even a scratch!

"A little lamb had been quietly nibbling the grass among the blocks of stone, and the man had fallen exactly upon it. The lamb had been crushed to death, but the man was saved. He never rested till he had employed a sculptor to make a stone lamb and place it where you see it now, in token of his gratitude."

"I was so much interested by this touching incident, and especially by its resemblance to Christ, the Lamb that was slain for us—the Lamb of God, Who taketh away the sin of the world."

"I entered the Cathedral with the rest, and saw its paintings and its carvings, its rich decorations and magnificent monuments; but I felt utterly indifferent to them all. I could think of nothing but the tiler and the lamb; and, above all, of the Lamb Who had given His life for me."—Good Words.

For the Southern Churchman. A Little Song For Summer.

N. B. T.

Summer time's leaving us a bit too soon,
We can't help wishing 'twas just at June—

Apple trees and roses,
Butterflies and posies,
Every little robin with his own gay tune;
But let's keep humming an old, old song,
Ever new and ever true a whole life long—

Not a single season is ever really sad,
Any time of any year you can be glad!

Summer time is slipping down a long,
long lane,

The leaves will soon be falling in the chilly rain,

The woods will soon be gray,
The birds will fly away,
We'll look for pretty flowers in the fields in vain.

Autumn time is coming on swift, swift feet,

But a little song we're humming mighty true and mighty sweet:

Not a single season is ever really sad—
Any time of any year you can be glad!

Faithful Leo.

The sun beat down with hot rays upon the hay fields. It was making the once green grass into fragrant hay which Grandpa White would stow away in his barn loft for old Brindle, Daisy and Dolly, the horse, to eat next winter.

Marjorie and Ralph had chosen the tallest haycock for their playhouse. They worked busily, until they had hollowed out a cozy nook upon the shady side. Then they went back to the farmhouse for some playthings.

"I wish you to amuse the baby for a little while, Marjorie," said her mother. "I must finish the ironing this afternoon and sew some lace upon your new dress."

"All right, mamma," agreed Marjorie, cheerily. "Ralph and I are playing house down in grandpa's hay field, and Beth shall be our baby."

"Do not play out in the hot sunshine," warned mother.

"Oh, our house is on the shady side of a big haystack," explained Marjorie.

"And the wild grape vine that climbs on the rail fence is near by and makes it seem cooler," added Ralph.

When they went back to their playhouse Marjorie carried Lillian, her prettiest doll, Ralph had a new book which his aunt had sent on his birthday, and Baby Beth hugged a plump Teddy bear. Grandpa's dog, Leo, trotted on behind.

"Poor doggy, it is too bad you can't take off your great coat," said Marjorie, as Leo threw himself down in the shade with his tongue lolling out. "Just see how he is panting, Ralph."

"I should think he would go swimming in the pond and get cooled," replied Ralph. "That's what I should do if I were a dog."

They played happily for a long time. Marjorie dressed her doll in its best silk gown, while Ralph read aloud from his story-book. Beth tumbled about in the hay playing with Teddy. Leo stretched out lazily, until he looked like a yellow fur rug, and took a nap.

By and by Marjorie said it was lunch time, and they ate the little frosted cakes which grandma had put into a paper bag for them.

It grew hotter as the breeze which had been cooling the hay fields stopped blowing. The sunshine did not seem as bright. Hazy clouds were gathering above the western hills.

Baby Beth cuddled her curly head upon one chubby arm and went sound asleep. Marjorie made her a little pillow of hay and laid Teddy beside her.

"Doesn't she look comfy and sweet!" she exclaimed.

Ralph looked up from his book. He had been away in a New York zoo, gazing at all sorts of wild animals.

"Oh, say Marjorie!" he cried. "Gramp is going to get in a load of hay. See, Dennis has Dolly and the hay cart! Let's have a ride to the barn."

Marjorie hesitated. "Baby is sure to sleep for an hour and nothing will hurt her," she decided. "I'll race you across the field."

Away they flew, while Baby Beth and Leo slept on.

It was great fun to tramp down the sweet-smelling hay as grandpa and the hired man tossed up great heaping forkfuls.

Then all at once it grew dark and the wind began to blow. Grandpa trotted old Dolly, that he might get the hay into the barn before the rain came. Just as they reached the end of the lane great rain-drops splashed down and the thunder pealed loudly.

Suddenly Marjorie cried out, "Oh, Baby Beth!" In the excitement and fun she had forgotten her little sister under the haystack.

"Quick, mamma!" she called, running into the kitchen and catching her mother's hand. "Come with me and get Baby Beth. I'm afraid to go alone because it's lightning."

Together they ran across the fields. Wild fears flashed through Marjorie's mind. Perhaps the hay might have fallen in and smothered baby! Suppose, just suppose, that she had waked up and wandered down to the pond and been drowned!

Under the haystack, safely sheltered from the storm, they found Baby Beth. Her face was rosy with slumber, but her eyes were big and frightened and tears were rolling down her cheeks. In front of her, on guard, his great body protecting her from harm, was Leo, his shaggy coat dripping with rain. He wagged his tail and whined with relief when he saw baby's mother coming.

"Naughty Leo, wouldn't let baby dit out!" sobbed Beth.

Mrs. White wrapped the baby in a shawl she had brought and hurried home. Poor frightened Marjorie followed closely, bringing Teddy and Lillian, whose lovely silk gown was spoiled. Leo ran on ahead, barking joyously.

Her mother did not need to scold penitent Marjorie.

"Old dog Leo was better'n I was," she sobbed. "I never thought of the bad things that might happen to baby; I didn't even remember she was under the haystack till it began to thunder. I was just thinking about Marjorie White's good time, and I'm just as 'shamed as I can be. I'm glad Lillian's blue dress is spoiled. I'm glad I'm sopping wet. I ought to get cold and be sick a whole month, only I s'pose you'd have to take care of me."

Mother patted Leo's shaggy head, saying, "Faithful doggie!" Then she raised Marjorie's tear-stained face and gave her a forgiving kiss.

"Mamma is sure that her little girl will remember next time," she whispered gently.—Zion's Herald.

Winifred's Visitor.

It's one thing to be an important person traveling alone to grandfather's on the train, and another thing to reach there and find yourself ever so much younger and smaller than anybody else on the place. Up to this time, Winifred had always lived too far away to visit her grandparents, but now that the homes were closer together, it had been decided to send her up-state to stay with her mother's people while things were being settled in the new home.

She was very proud of coming alone, and very pleased with everything she found. But after the first few hours, strangely enough, there seemed something lacking in her pleasure. She was not homesick, because mother herself was coming shortly. No, it could not be homesickness. After a while she knew that her trouble was the want of a playmate.

By noon of the second day she had grown very solemn, and once or twice, when her eyes seemed to smart, and she put up a finger, it came away wet. "Oh, dear me," she thought, hurriedly, "I think I'll take a look at the parlor; that's the only room I haven't been through, yet. It ought to make a splendid cave."

During hot weather the parlor blinds were kept closed, so that when Winifred pushed open the door and slid in from the bright hall, she found it dark in there, and cool and quiet. A spicy smell of matting and of old polished furniture greeted her, but her eyes, unused to the shadows, could not make out anything plainly, at first, and she decided to wait a while until the room grew lighter.

All at once she sat up, blinking. The room was still dark, but one long ray of sunlight had fallen across it from somewhere, and at the end of the light, as though at the end of a climbing, golden pathway, stood a fair little girl dressed in white and carrying a big bouquet of bright flowers. She had a sweet little face, half-smiling, dimpled and blue-eyed, and beside her was a tiny dog, his ears pricked knowingly.

Winifred reached out glad arms. "Hullo!" she said, "did you come to see me?"

But the little girl still smiled silently, and Winifred, catching the warm, delicious scent of roses, smiled back. "Your flowers are pretty," she said. "Want to play?"

Still the child said nothing, however—even when Winifred whistled coaxingly to the cunning dog, who took no notice, either.

She lay back and shut her eyes tight, counting till the clock in the hall had ticked two whole minutes away. Then she opened her eyes again joyfully, and sat up.

But the room was quite dark once more; there was no sign of little girl or of dog. Grieved and amazed, Winifred got up and stumbled out where the older folks sat. She looked at them with a quivering lip. "Where did the little girl go?" she cried.

"What little girl, dearie?" asked Aunt Bess.

"Well, well!" exclaimed grandfather, "the baby's been dreaming!"

But grandmother drew Winifred to her. "No," she said, "not even asleep —not with those clear, wide-open eyes. Tell us what you mean, dear child."

While Winifred told her story, they listened surprised and puzzled. After she had finished, grandfather led her back into the parlor. She peered around eagerly, hoping against hope for a glimpse of the fair child she had lost, but the room was dusky dark, and she looked in vain. "Gone!" she choked, sorrowfully.

Presently grandfather walked to the window and touched the shutter. A narrow shaft of sunlight shot across to the other wall. "Look, look, there she is!" Winifred cried, jumping in her joy. And sure enough, at the end of the yellow path of sunlight again stood the little stranger, sweet and smiling.

The shutters flew wide now, and Winifred gave a little gasp. For the child still stood before her, but a few feet up on the wall instead of in the path, and a gilt frame enclosed her and the tiny dog!

Grandfather lifted Winifred and held her up to the picture. "Bless your heart!" he said, huskily. "Sure enough, you didn't dream, my girlie! The little lass came into sight when the wind blew open the blind. The sweet smell was that rosebush in the hot sun under the window. And the little girl herself—who do you think she is?"

"I know I've seen her face before," Winifred answered, slowly.

"And so you have. That's your mother, dear, when she was your age—your little mother and her dog, Tray." He held her closer, and she kissed the sweet visitor's face and the wee dog's fur.

"Put me down, now, grandfather," she said, happily, "I'm not one bit lonesome any more!"—S. S. Times.

A Child Helper.

Our Lord had cured so many sick and ailing people and had done so much good that whenever He appeared on the streets a little group gathered. Then He would stretch out His hand and heal someone and more and more people would come to listen and watch.

One day Jesus went up into a mountain with His disciples. It may have been that He had something special to say to them, or He may have gone for rest and quiet. We do not know.

Very soon the people found out where He was and they gathered about Him until there were five thousand in the company. They listened all day to His teaching, and Jesus knew they must be hungry. So He said to Philip:

"Where can we buy bread, so that they may have something to eat?"

Philip did not know. They were far away from any town and he may have thought that no one among the apostles had money enough to pay for bread for so many. So he said: "Two hundred penny-worth of bread is not enough for them so that every one may have a little."

Then into the company came a boy, eager to help. He had only five loaves and two fishes, hardly enough for one person, but he gave it gladly, and Jesus accepted it. He told His apostles to have the people sit down on the soft green grass.

What a hush of expectancy there must have been when they were all seated! Even the little children would fold their hands and be still as they watched.

Jesus took the bread and thanked God for it. Then He gave it to His apostles to distribute among the people. In the same manner He gave God thanks for the fish and the disciples gave them to the people until everyone had all they wanted. Afterward Jesus told them to gather up the pieces that were left over and they filled twelve baskets. Yet, until they brought them to Him there were only five loaves and two fishes.

It was because our Lord was God that He could do such wonderful things; but you see the little boy and the apostles had a share in it, too. Isn't it good of Jesus to let us help in His work? We ought to be very eager to bring whatever we have to Him, money, talent, or time, so that He may bless and use it.—Shepherd's Arms.

The Statue of Liberty.

Nearly every child in the United States knows that in New York harbor stands a large statue, called "Liberty Enlightening the World."

But do you know that the statue was made by a French sculptor named Frederic Auguste Bartholdi, and given to our country by France, and was erected on Bedloe's Island in the harbor in 1886?

The immense bronze figure of Liberty, that stands a few inches more than one hundred and eleven feet, was designed for the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence, which was celebrated in 1876. It took many years to make this statue and it was not until 1881 that it was brought to the United States. During the next five years, money was raised to build the foundation by the people of our country, and the statue was dedicated October 28, 1886, being the highest in the world and weighing 450,000 pounds. From the base of the foundation to the torch are four hundred and three steps. The right arm that is raised is forty-two feet long; the hand measured sixteen feet, while Liberty's index finger is eight feet in length; the nail on that finger is thirteen by ten inches. In the arm is a ladder that has fifty-four rungs on it.

The nose is more than four feet long, the head more than seventeen feet. The mouth is three feet wide; each eye measures two feet, and the distance across the face from ear to ear is ten feet.

The torch is almost three hundred and six feet above the mean tide of the bay, and twelve persons can stand on the platform at the foot of the torch. In the head is a similar platform, where forty can comfortably stand.

Such a large statue, that cost when completed about $600,000, was a wonderful gift from France, and the powerful electric light, that is operated by the lighthouse service of our government, lights the New York harbor and the Atlantic Ocean for many, many miles.—Exchange.

A Soldier's Friend.

By Thomas R. Waring, Jr., Summerville, S. C., Aged 12.

There it lay, crumpled, mashed and almost dead, a poor little purple violet. It had been lying there now for three days, ever since Joe had been picked up dead.

This is how it happened: Joe, one of the American soldiers in France, had received from a small French peasant girl a bunch of the most beautiful violets ever seen. Being an unselfish boy, he had distributed them among his fellow soldiers till he found that he had only one left. This he placed in his coat as a friend and a comforter.

The next day his regiment was ordered to advance upon the enemy—and now you know the story of how the poor little violet came to be lying alone upon the battlefield. Joe had been killed, and after the stretcher-bearers removed his body there was no one to keep the little violet company, so there it lay, almost dead in the hot sun.

Presently an officer came by. Seeing the little flower half dead he picked it up and said, "Poor little thing! How Bessie loved these delicate flowers! I will keep this as a reminder." So saying, he placed it in his wallet. The violet that was so forlorn a few minutes ago was now the happiest flower on earth.

That officer values the violet as a jeweler values his most precious gems, and he never looks at it that he does not think of his home folks and the cause for which he is fighting so hard—that he does not pray God to help him fight harder for his home, country, flag and freedom.

When to Cry.

There are millions of little boys and girls in the world who want to do just the right thing and the very best thing. But they do not always know what just the right thing is, and sometimes they cannot tell the very best thing from the very worst thing.

Now, I have often thought that there are little boys and girls who cry, now and then, at the wrong time; and I have asked many of the older people, but none of them could tell me the best time to cry.

But on the other day I met a man older and wiser than any of the rest. He was very old and very wise, and he told me:

"It is bad luck to cry on Monday.

"To cry on Tuesday makes red eyes.

"Crying on Wednesday is bad for children's heads and for the heads of older people.

"It is said that if a child begins to cry on Thursday, he will find it hard to stop.

"It is not best for children to cry on Friday. It makes them unhappy.

"Never cry on Saturday. It is too busy a day.

"Tears shed on Sunday are salt and bitter.

"Children should on no account cry at night. The nights are for sleep.

"They may cry whenever else they please, but not at any of these times, unless it is for something serious."

I wrote down the rules just as the old man gave them to me. Of course, they will be of no use to boys and girls who are past six, for those children do not cry. The wise old man meant them for the little ones—the millions of little boys and girls who want to do the right thing and the very best thing.—Mary Elizabeth Stone, in St. Nicholas.

LETTERS FROM RHEUMATICS

Possibly you have imagined that you could never get your own consent to write a testimonial letter, but if you have ever experienced the excruciating pains of Rheumatism you can at least appreciate the feelings of those who have been relieved of this terrible disease by drinking the Mineral Water from the justly celebrated Shivar Spring at Shelton, S. C. This water overcomes many diseases, including Indigestion, Gout, Uric Acid Poisoning and Liver and Kidney diseases, but no patrons of the Spring are more enthusiastic in their praise of the water than those who have been relieved of their Rheumatism. Hundreds of letters like the following have been received by the Management:

Dr. Cosby, a South Carolina physician writes:—"I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of Rheumatism, Chronic Indigestion, Kidney and Bladder troubles and in Nervous and Sick Headaches and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the Liver, Kidneys and Bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter."

Dr. Avant, of Savannah, writes:—"I suffered for years with a most aggravating form of stomach disorder and consulted a number of our best local physicians, went to Baltimore and consulted specialists there and still I was not benefited. I had about despaired of living when I began to use Shivar Spring Water and in a short time was cured."

Mr. Rhodes, of Virginia, writes:—"Please send me ten gallons of Shivar Spring Water quickly. I want it for Rheumatism. I know of several who were cured of Rheumatism with this water."

Editor Cunningham writes:—"The water has done more good than any medicine I have ever taken for Rheumatism. Am entirely free from pain."

Mr. McClam, of South Carolina, writes:—"My wife has been a sufferer from Rheumatism and after drinking twenty gallons of your Mineral Water was entirely cured of the horrible disease."

Mr. Carter, of Virginia, writes:—"Mrs. Carter has had enlarged joints upon her hands, caused by Rheumatism. Shivar Spring Water removed every trace of the enlargement. The water is simply excellent."

If you suffer with Rheumatism, or with any chronic disease, accept the guarantee offer below by signing your name. Clip and mail to the Shivar Spring.

Box 64 - R. Shelton, S. C.

Gentlemen:-

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Spring Water. I agree to give it a fair trial, in accordance with instructions contained in booklet you will send, and if it fails to benefit my case, you agree to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return promptly.

my things away and loses them. I wish they could be let alone."

Edith showed no little fretfulness and irritation of temper. "There is one thing," said her mamma, "that I think you might keep if you would try."

"I should like to keep even one thing," answered Edith.

"Well, then, my dear, keep your temper. If you will only do that, you will find it easier to keep other things. If you had used your time in searching for the lost scissors, you might have found them before this. You have only got a passion; and you have accused somebody, perhaps unjustly, of taking away your scissors and losing them. Keep your temper, Edith, even if you lose all the little property you have. Getting into a passion never brings anything to light except an unhappy face; and besides getting yourself into a passion, you accuse somebody else of doing wrong."

Edith began to think. She got over her ill humor, searched for her scissors and found them in her own work-bag. "Why, mamma!" she exclaimed, "here they are. I might have been sewing all this time if I had kept my temper."—Jewels.

Two events in the Roman Catholic world are attracting wide interest among both Catholics and Protestants. One is the breaking of diplomatic relations between the Vatican and Vienna. Since the break with France, and the withdrawal of the nuncio at Paris, the Austrian nunciature has been the chief one of the Catholic diplomatic services. This service has already been reduced almost to its limit, Madrid, Lisbon and Munich being practically the only ones. Austria has been the bulwark of the Vatican for centuries, and the Archbishop of Vienna, and the nuncio of the Vatican at the Austrian Court, the historic places of power. A break at Vienna, whatever the cause, indicates in some measure the tremendous strain which the war has put upon the Roman Catholic Church.

The other event, which interests Protestants exceedingly, they say, is the call to prayer just issued by Cardinals Gibbons, Farley and O'Connell. The high patriotism of the call, the showing in numbers of men in service, the response which is sure to follow the appeal, the aptness of the phrase, "Fight like heroes and pray like saints"—all these give immense encouragement to everybody. Protestants say it is a vindication of their methods, and a strengthening of the Christian cause because an exhibition of unity such as never occurred before. Protestants are saying they will do all they can to further response to the appeal. Already a Protestant movement is on foot to the same end.

The Sense of Sin: One of the marked features of the religious life of our time is a lost sense of sin. Never was Christ held in higher regard. He is the dominant personality of the civilized world. To His character all men accord an adoring reverence. His word is the final authority in the spiritual life. Yet that sense of sin which so afflicted and tormented His spirit, that realization of sin as a heinous wrong to God, a revolt against His will, and the burden of His heart, has greatly passed away. How seldom do men write in their diary, "My sin is ever before me"! How seldom do men bow down in the house of prayer, not able to lift up their eyes unto heaven, and cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner"! How few seek another's presence at midnight with the urgent demand, "What must I do to be saved"! The broken confessions of the Penitential Psalms, the agonizing supplications of Scripture, the experiences of those religious classics which our fathers read with tears, and even the message of the gospel itself, have all become unmeaning because of this lost sense of sin.—W. M. Clow.

The win the war community forums, starting in New England and growing in number rapidly there, are extending to other parts of the country, and are being broadened in scope. The addition to their plan is the training of workers, the promotion of scientific methods, and the doing of real work—after needs have been presented. Reports come from Western Pennsylvania, from Ohio and from two centers on Long Island, where forums have been established and the work entered upon. The New England town meeting forms the model of the forums, and churches of nearly all bodies are entering into the movement. A New England Congress of Forums has sent appeals to the Northwest and into Pacific coast cities, and reports that responses are immediate, because critical situations are to be met.

Plans for these forums seem to be in the making, but things settled concerning them are that the people must be aroused to the seriousness of the war situation, and that immediate steps must be taken to prepare for reconstruction following the war. Democracy does not obtain in the State or in the Church, it is held, and it will obtain only after hard work. Fellowship, justice, the development of the average man—these are the announced aims, and throughout the Middle West, where the churches seem to be promoting it, there are being added the training features; training for both Church and civic service.

God loves each one of us with an intensity infinitely beyond what the most fervid human spirit ever felt toward another and with a concentration as if He had none else to think of. And His love has brought us into being, just that we might be taught to enter into full sympathy with Him, receiving His—giving our own—thus entering into the joy of our Lord. This is the hope—the sure and certain hope—set before us; sure and certain, for "the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee."—Ersrine.

SECURITY AND SERVICE

Our Tongues in War Times.

Let us take heed to our ways that we sin not with our tongue. These are exciting times, and it is easy to say things which had best be left unsaid. We must be patient with one another. A thousand vexing and tangled questions will come up for discussion, and all of us cannot possibly think alike. The only sensible thing for us is to do our own thinking, and let everybody else do his, without our pouncing on him and cudgeling him because he does not happen to agree with us. Blessed is the man who gets through this war without needlessly wounding acquaintances and friends by the cruel strokes of an unruly tongue. There will be enough wreckage at the end of the war without our adding to it a mass of ruined friendships. Let us do our utmost to maintain a cordial fellowship with our fellow-Christians whose opinions are farthest from our own, and by our extraordinary self-control, refrain from saying things of which we shall be ashamed when the world is calm again. The world is torn by many demons, and we cannot afford to increase the fever and distraction by our impatient temper or our bitter tongue.—Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, in Watchman-Examiner.

Why is a true repentance so rare? Because it is one of the most difficult things in the world. For a man to stand and confess that he has gone astray, that he has done an evil deed which has been hidden from men's eyes, that he has been keeping God out of his life, is the most costly and the most humiliating thing a man can do. It is difficult for a youth to repent and to acknowledge the heedless word and willful deed. It is still more difficult for a man of middle life to repent, when the first sensitive impulses have lost their power and worldliness has become a habit of the mind. For an old man, when a man's pride has become high and stubborn, to confess that he has mutinied against God's will, and cherished secret thoughts of iniquity, is the most difficult reach and throw of the human will. That is why the old so seldom repent. That is why the young should seize every tender moment, and beware of hardening the holy delicacy of a religious impression. That is why Jesus uttered His mystic sentence about the joy of heaven.—W. M. Clow.

Holding to a Course.

When once we have decided to do a certain thing at a certain time, that thing ought to be done at that time—unless this would be positively wrong—simply because we decided that we would do it then. For any decision made, or intention formed, is a promise of the will; and the turning from that decision or intention, unless such change is a plain duty, means a broken and weakened will. This is as true of the ordinary routine duties of daily life in the home or the office as of decisions in matters of moral right and wrong.—Selected.

As head of the War Time Commission of the Churches, Dr. Robert E. Speer will go to France and perhaps beyond to make a study of Christian work among the Allies. It is known that Dr. John R. Mott, of the Y. M. C. A., is urging the sending abroad of a considerable delegation of Christian leaders of prominence, possibly to go to Russia if the way open. It is also known that Dr. Mott wishes it can come to pass that some touch be had with the Roman Catholic workers in the war in France and Italy. The board of which he is secretary has granted Dr. Speer a leave of absence for three months.

Information has it that there is not a little dissatisfaction with achievements of the various War Commissions of the different Protestant bodies. It seems to be thought that not nearly as much has been accomplished as ought to have been within the time. Great as has been the co-operation between bodies, public sentiment in most of them demands even more, as one means to win the war. It is said to be probable that several commissions, those in the different bodies, will be overhauled. One or two have been overhauled already.

A purpose of the deputation abroad is to examine at first hands what is being done, not to criticize it, but to ascertain how Christian people at home can better co-operate. The Rev. Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, of the Federal Council of Churches, has determined to go, and it is said to be likely that half a dozen others will do so as members of the general War Time Commission. A second purpose is to study Russia and if possible to get into touch with the Eastern Church.

BEFORE YOU GO TO FRANCE LEARN FRENCH AND ABOUT FRANCE

"The American Soldier in France"

A military guide-book for our troops going abroad, by Geo. N. Tricoche, late of the French army.

Read what the chief of staff says about it:

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES

Office of the Chief of Staff

(Extracts from a letter dated General Headquarters, October 15, 1917.)

"... The six copies of 'The American Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing... and the remainder will be distributed to staff officers...."

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover.... Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc."...

(Signed) J. HARBORD, Chief of Staff.

Twenty Years of the Shanghai Y. M. C. A.

The educational institution in China which enrolls more students than any other is the Shanghai Young Men's Christian Association, the number in the high school and evening school of commerce being 1,592. The school of commerce has placed its graduates in business houses of every description not only Shanghai, but in other cities. Classes are given in accountancy, advertising, banking, bookkeeping, business English and correspondence, geography, commercial practice, stenography, typewriting, Chinese classics, Japanese, Mandarin, first aid to the injured, etc.

These facts were brought out in connection with the recent celebration of the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the Shanghai Association, which was an occasion of much interest. Over 1,200 were present at the banquet, among whom were consuls of the allied nations and prominent Chinese officials. Addresses and a musical program followed the banquet. The total number of young men and boys paying membership fees in 1917 was reported as 3,200, and the number making use of the gymnasium was 136,485. The budget for last year was more than $119,000, all raised in membership and educational fees. The members take pride in the fact that all funds used in the maintenance of the Y. M. C. A. comes from Chinese sources.

Bishop Brent on Church Union.

"There is no lesson which the churches are learning in the war zone of greater importance than the impotence of our divided Christianity. It is absurd to aim at a united mankind or even a united Christian civilization and to be content with a divided church. Many are feverishly anxious for something to be done to bring us together, but the moment for action is slipping by without action. The Archbishop of Upsala, all honour to him, has appealed for an ecumenical conference. Our own movement for a conference on faith and order has not been silent or idle. But surely, surely there must be two eventual peace tables, one of the exhausted nations, the other of the exhausted churches. To have the former without the latter would mean that the spiritual vision and the moral conscience of the nations was superior to that of the churches. So far as the churches are concerned, if all of them will not gather at call in the name of Christ, the only solid foundation for the present, the sole hope of the future, at least those should gather who are ready and willing. There is enough catholic love, scholarship, impartiality and intelligence in our ranks to safeguard and present the position of any absentees. The broken soul of the broken human family must give place to a whole soul in a whole family. A confused church will be a potent factor in maintaining a confused world. I see no glimmer of hope for permanent and fraternal peace among the nations without at least as permanent and fraternal a peace among the churches."—From Report to Diocesan Council.

Love and Service.

A spirit of loving service should fill the heart of every Christian. Those to whom we give kindness and love will return the same with fidelity and service rendered in like spirit. We are usually paid in returns of our own gifts. Love invites its own response; service inspires to service; and the memory of a kindness done may prove to us a welcome shelter and defense in time of need. It may be thou dost not love thy neighbor; it may be thou thinkest only how to get from him, how to gain by him. How lonely, then, must thou be! how shut up in thy poverty-stricken room, with the bare walls of thy selfishness and the hard couch of thy unsatisfaction!—George Macdonald.

When a man makes an offering of money to God, he gives a slice of his time, his labor, his life.

To Thee.

I bring my sins to Thee,
The sins I cannot count,
That all may cleansed be
In thy once-opened Fount.
I bring them, Saviour, all to Thee;
The burden is too great for me.

My heart to Thee I bring,
The heart I cannot read,
A faithless wandering thing,
An evil heart indeed.
I bring it, Saviour, now to Thee,
That fixed and faithful it may be.

To Thee I bring my care,
The care I cannot flee;
Thou wilt not only share,
But take it all for me.
O, loving Saviour, now to Thee
I bring the load that wearies me.

I bring my grief to Thee,
The grief I cannot tell;
No words shall needed be,
Thou knowest all so well.
I bring the sorrow laid on me,
O, suffering Saviour, all to Thee.

My joys to Thee I bring,
The joys Thy love has given,
That each may be a wing
To lift me nearer heaven.
I bring them, Saviour, all to Thee,
Who hast procured them all for me.

My life I bring to Thee,
I would not be my own;
O, Saviour, let me be Thine ever, Thine alone!
My heart, my life, my all I bring
To Thee, my Saviour and my King.

COLLEGE OF William & Mary

1693 Historic in Association;
Modern in Equipment; 1918
Progressive in Spirit;

William and Mary offers every advantage of a modern, liberal education in a cultured and historic community. Chartered by King William and Queen Mary, developed by such officials as Jefferson, Washington and John Tyler, it has for 221 years served the cause of American education. It educated John Marshall, James Monroe, Winfield Scott, George Wythe, Peyton Randolph, Jefferson and Tyler; its recent students are leaders in Virginia today.

Full Collegiate courses leading to the A. B., B. S., and M. A. degrees. Large, efficient faculty. High entrance and academic standards. Excellent laboratory facilities for the study of the natural sciences, drawing and manual arts. 12 buildings with modern equipment; heating and power plant; large shaded campus; 25 acre athletic grounds.

The College of William and Mary is the Teachers' College of Virginia; special two-year course, based on high school graduation, for the teachers' diploma. 132 scholarships for men and women training to be teachers. Free tuition to ministerial students. Special pre-medical course. All courses open to men and women.

The honor-system of student government had its origin at William and Mary. Pure religious and social surroundings; student life free from harmful and costly habits; low expenses made possible through state aid and situation in an inexpensive community.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Though the past is irrevocable, it is not irreparable.

If I cannot realize my ideal, I can at least idealize my real.

Those who would borrow trouble, never have to go far to find it.

While Peter was warming himself by the enemy's fire it was easy for him to deny his Lord.

"Do the duty which lies nearest thee," which thou knowest to be a duty. Thy second duty will already have become clearer.

There is a great deal of unmapped country within us which would have to be taken into account in an explanation of our gusts and storms.

Our lives are what their details are. The goal is reached by God's ordering of their separate steps. The only thing we are to be careful about is that we step each time in the track of Christ.

We sleep, but the loom of life never stops; and the pattern which was weaving when the sun went down, is weaving when it comes up to-morrow.

Any trouble or anxiety that makes you feel helpless and lonely and in need of a Human Helper and a Human Comforter, thank God for it. He is teaching you to cast yourself upon One who is perfectly human because perfectly divine.—Selected.

When the corn is nearly ripe it bows the head and droops lower than when it was green. In like manner when the people of God are near ripe for heaven they grow more humble and self-denying than in the days of their earlier development.—John Flavel.

One man says: "I do not go to church on Sunday because I was never taught to go when I was young, so I did not form the habit." Another man says: "I do not go to church on Sunday because I was forced to go when I was young, and it grew distasteful to me." One excuse is as good as another when you do not want to do a thing.—Watchman-Examiner.

We cannot know the grief that men may borrow,
We cannot see the souls storm-swept by sorrow,
But love can shine upon the way to-day, to-morrow—
Let us be kind.

In dissolution there is no bridgeless chasm, no unfathomable gulf of separation; the spirit does not immediately become inaccessible, leaping at a bound to an immeasurable distance. Look at another person while living; the soul is not visible, only the body which it animates. Therefore, merely because after death the soul is not visible is no demonstration that it does not still live. The condition of being unseen is the same condition which occurs while the body is living, so that intrinsically there is nothing exceptional or supernatural in the life of the soul after death.

Allah Objects to the Panama Canal.

One day D— wandered into a school up the Tigris. On the wall hung a map of the western hemisphere. The class was being taught something about the new world. The teacher, knowing that his visitor was an American, asked him to tell something of his homeland. So D— pointed to the Isthmus of Panama and told of the canal and the project of uniting two worlds. When he was through the teacher stepped forward with the following cogent moral:

"This teaches us how we are privileged to live in a land where Allah is known and feared. Over there they purpose to cross Allah's path by making water to flow where he made land."

But D—'s comeback took the wind out of the sails of the mullah. "I see," said he, "you have made a bridge across the Tigris here. If Allah had wanted you to walk on the other side, why did he separate you from it by a river?"

A teacher in a government school was looking over a magazine which displayed the picture of a typewriter. When I explained to him the functions of a typewriter and the advantages of its use, he looked mystified. Finally a great light seemed to dawn.

"Ah, yes," said he, "that is a fine invention. I see it now. It is for such as cannot read or write."—From "Seven Innings in Mesopotamia," in "Asia" magazine for July.

There is music in heaven, because in music there is no self-will. Music goes on certain laws and rules. Man did not make these laws of music; he has only found them out; and if he be self-willed and break them, there is an end of his music instantly; all he brings out is discord and ugly sounds. The greatest musician in the world is as much bound by those laws as the learned in the school, and the greatest musician is the one who, instead of fancying that, because he is clever, he may throw aside the laws of music, knows the laws of music best, and observes them most reverently. And therefore it was that the old Greeks, the wisest of all the heathens, made a point of teaching their children music; because they said it taught them not to be self-willed and fanciful, but to see the beauty of order, the usefulness of rule, the divineness of laws. And therefore music is fit for heaven; therefore music is a pattern and type of heaven, and of the everlasting life of God, which perfect spirits live in heaven; a life of melody and order in themselves; a life of harmony with each other and with God.—Charles Kingsley.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. PRAYER FOR ENEMIES.

We are naturally concerned in these days to show an uncompromising spirit of patriotism. The debilitating doubts and demoralizing fears of pacifism are instinct with tendencies which, if allowed full play, would break down the morale of the American people. And those who desire chiefly a moral victory would summon to the strife all that makes for vigor of soul and an unshakable spirit.

Perhaps there is, however, a yet greater danger threatening American life today. For there is more than one determined way to fight. One way is right and the other wrong. One is Christian and the other pagan. While we must have the force of nation-wide determination to win this war, yet we cannot be content with merely weighing this force. As Christians we are constrained to test its spirit and quality.

In the press of absorbing thoughts and duties brought to us as patriots in these distressful days, we have need to consider with an ever-deepening penetration that we are fighting first and last as Soldiers of the Cross. Necessary and righteous as the war is, it is entirely possible that in false patriotism to country there may be generated treason to our God. In outreaching even the demands of Government we may fall short of loyalty to Him who gave Himself for us and who tests our fellowship with Him by our obedience to the letter and spirit of His commandments.

There are two kinds of patriotism in America. One nerves itself in a spirit of hate and ruthless revenge against the foe. The other has ableness of soul to pray for a vulgar and cruel enemy, and to have its very praying increase its uncompromising determination to "carry on." The history and genius of true Americanism is that of the working out of this latter spirit. The stuff of our liberty is essentially Christian.

Christian men pray for their enemies. They adjust their patriotism to their religion. They interpret the demands of country in terms of the commands of Christ.

Many Christians, self-confident, prayed for the enemy in the beginnings of the conflict. But as cruelty was added to cruelty there came to them a change, conscious or unconscious. They felt their patriotism strengthened, and at the same time their hate for the foe intensified. So it seemed to them that the two must be one. The author of "Carry On" tells us that in the trenches he never hated his enemies. But the time came when he undertook an official investigation of French repatriates. He saw them coming home, a pitiful, heart-broken, half-demented throng. Many minds could not span in mental grasp the pathos of the part they play in the great tragedy. Then, says Coningsley Dawson, for the first time he hated his foe. The thing had gone too far.

When our boys are killed or ill-treated in Germany will the last vestige of intercession for the enemy vanish? Will the horror then have gone too far? Is it a question of more or less before the spirit of our religion falls us?

Let us instead find some attitude of heart, some effort of will in prayer, for the enemy, not unhumanly hard, which shall strengthen and not demoralize our fighting stamina.

Many have come to the point where they do not want to pray for the foe. They fear it will lessen resistance and demoralize effort. Men who have abandoned decency and honor, who glory in the might of their ruthlessness, have no right, they argue, to recognition or to intercession.

Then the barrage of human hate that clings about the soul lifts for a moment. A mountain-top comes into view where meet the ways of God and man. On Calvary's Cross the Son of Man hangs between two worlds at once in loneliness and victory of soul. He is utterly sinless; cruelly, brutally, devilishly stoned against. His trial is a mockery; His sentence of death is a travesty on all human justice. What has become of honor and manhood? Why should God recognize such a world? Why not crush man and vindicate the loving, massacred heart of His only begotten Son?

But Jesus hung there and prayed for His enemies: "Father, forgive them."

He bids us share His spirit of prayer for enemies, and to look for forgiveness only as we have the will to forgive. "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." The Master knew what was in man when He gave these orders to His followers. He prophesied of wars—terrible and destructive. So we must choose, as to the type of our patriotism, between a pagan shrewdness which perceiving that the foe is unworthy deems him rightly an object of hate, and on the other hand Christian loyalty, which sees the cruel facts if possible even more clearly, and therefore is the more bent on pleading the Master's power to create worth. One effort of soul tends to thrust men into hell; the other, to save them from hell.

It is a day of decision, both in body and soul. We must take sides—we are taking sides—in the secret places of our souls where we are being judged of God.

But let us see how joy and worth of soul comes in accepting the Christian truth of prayer for our enemies. Would we acknowledge that the power of Prussianism is greater than the power of God? Shall the spirit and system of Prussia delimit His power to save? Have we no more conquering Lord than this to worship and serve? We do not pray for our enemies as an acknowledgment of their worth or dignity. We pray because of our Lord's unconquerable saviourhood, able to take from the foe, in the self-revealing, cleansing fires of conflict, all that we are at war with in them—the brutal and fiendish lust of war and oppression.

The point at issue is not indulgent weakness in thinking of the enemy, but faith in the mightiness of Christ's saviourhood. This spirit of prayer, when it really possesses a soldier-heart, is the finest fighting-morale in the world. It brooks no half-way measures; it knows no ignoble peace. Not content with conquering only the body of the enemy, it must win the soul also. It has no lesser object than to establish at all costs the kingdom of God.

This spirit may prolong rather than shorten the day of battle. Its ends are both more inspiring and more exacting. In uncompromising fashion it fights the enemy with physical weapons, and also with a force of character able to make strong intercessions that Christ's will may be established even in the soul of the enemy; that the spirit and system of war may be crushed by a foe who at last turns upon his own experience, and is lifted by God's Creative Spirit into a new liberty. We pray this not only for the enemy, but as the only way of final peace the world over.

It is plain then that intelligent intercession has nothing in common with the mild pity of pacifism, which camouflages the problems of the war instead of grappling with them. It has to do with a God so mighty that He can remove from the enemy the very will to war, and so make an end of the causes and occasions of strife. Christian intercession is not a question of pacifism, but of redemption; of a faith that can actually accept the Master's promise that we have the petitions which we ask in His Name; a capacity to act on these words of supreme authority: "All things are possible to him that believeth."

Shall not we remember as Christians that whatsoever the provocation the soul that hates loses somewhat of its own worth. If a nation be bent on spiritual ends it cannot be patriotism to destroy the strength of soul we fight with. The enemy's poisonous gas of hatred may inflict upon us a partial defeat of spirit, even in our act of winning the victory over him in the field. For surely we should know and follow some better ideal than his spirit of hate and revenge.

We make our Lord's part hard in the healing of the nations when we are not able to pray for the foe. For He has entrusted so large a share of His work of saving men to those who have pledged their loyalty to Him. He seeks to work through our intercessions. Our need is for the impulse that wills to save the enemy from his degradation and cruelty, and for the child-like faith to believe that our God is mighty enough to do this. We would not dissipate our energies and demoralize our souls with hate, but put them to patriotic service in prayer for the enemy.

A Christian Prayer for the Unchristian Foe.

O God, of all power and might, Who art the Father of all men and hatest nothing that Thou hast made: we plead the mightiness of Thy saviourhood to purge in the fires of battle the heart of the enemy. Take from him the system and spirit of war. May he feel the impotence of his sinful cruelty, and hate the selfish and relentless greed that makes for strife. So, blessed Lord, do Thou in Thy redeeming power remove the causes of conflict in the will of the foe and grant to him Thy creative spirit of a just and abiding peace.

May Thy kingdom come in all the world and Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven. And this we beg pleading the intercessory spirit of Him who from the cross prayed for His enemies, and gave Himself for us, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

"GERMAN ATROCITIES"—A CORRECTION.

Mr. Editor: I have read your editorial on German atrocities in your issue of August 3d with interest, and approval of most of its contentions. Your correspondents, however, are correct when they cast doubt on the authenticity of a so-called official report of the German headquarters on bombing operations. The German Government never issued any such report. You reply that official report "was taken from the Red Cross Bulletin." Certainly some one has done some not very careful reading. For the headlines of the so-called report in the Red Cross Bulletin states in large letters "(Not Wholly Imaginary)," thereby showing that it was only intended as a description of the German mind, and guarding against anyone taking it as an official report. It was not "a hoax written by some smart Alec" either, for it was exactly what it claimed to be—a description of the German official mind as interpreted by its deliberately planned and repeated actions. Every statement in this so-called report has been proved again and again, and the sentiments expressed are taken from writings and speeches of leading Germans. But as your correspondent says, the German Government has not been foolish enough to issue such an official report.

A. G. RICHARDS.

(We thank our correspondent for setting us right in regard to the excerpt mentioned, and apologize to our previous critics for our too-confident defense of its authenticity. The editor of the "Christianity and Community" page, who is now out of the city, must have overlooked or misapprehended the bracketed line, the omission of which misled us.—Ed. S. C.)

CAMOUFLAGING PROFANITY.

Mr. Editor:

President Garfield once said, "There are times in the history of men and nations when they stand so near the veil that separates time from eternity and men from God that they can almost hear the beatings and feel the pulsations of the heart of the infinite." Such a solemn period is that through which we are now passing, when, if ever men should be reverent before

God. Alas! Instead, we see a tendency to treat with a familiar flippancy names and scenes that once awakened profound awe. See the perfect "abandon" with which public men speak of "hell." They cry with gusto, "To hell with the Kaiser," and the great leader of our Modern Argonauts is reported as crying, "There'll be hell to pay". if men at the East don't put on even more speed in the building of ships than they have been doing. He even quotes the prophet Isaiah to support his view in a text that is expressly said to apply to the King of Assyria. Mr. Editor, I am not writing to defend the Kaiser in his iniquity, nor to denounce the great shipbuilder for his patriotism. But if we are a Christian people, we must seek God's help in His way, and that will not be found in consigning men to perdition. No man can do that. Our Lord says, "Be not afraid of them that kill the body and after that have no more than they can do. But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear. Fear Him who after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell—Yea, I say unto you, fear Him." Better pray God to have mercy upon the guilty Kaiser's soul and to bring him to his right mind. Better commend workmen for the splendid results attained in our shipbuilding and ask God to stir them up to even greater patriotic ardor and to bless them therefor. One sad thought is that this religious camouflaging has a bad effect upon our young men, especially our soldiers. When leading men thus speak they must also swell with similar emotions and think it great to explode with irreverent or profane language. I saw a letter recently from a young soldier abroad, in which he said, "It is raining like hell today." Incongruous, ridiculous statement, nevertheless an absurd following of men higher up. Let us have less profanity and more praying, less catering to men and more fear of God.

ROBT. A. EDWARDS.

Philadelphia.

"They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward." The value of a man's search for truth depends very much on the direction in which his look is turned. In the hour of your investigations, consider carefully whither your face is turned—toward Zion or away from Zion—it makes all the difference in the world. The Psalmist had a twofold wish—to "behold the beauty of the Lord, and to enquire in His temple"; but the beholding of the beauty came first, the inquiry afterwards, and verily he was right. Go and do thou likewise. Begin by looking at the picture. Meet Christ at the door of the tabernacle. Let Christ precede criticism. Let the gaze precede the grammar. Let love precede the learning. Let the song precede the science. Let the heart precede the history. Let the prayer precede the probing. Let the spirit precede the scrutiny. Ask by all means the way to Zion; but ask with your face thitherward.—George Matheson.

As long as we set up our own will and our own wisdom against God's, we make a wall between us and His love. But as soon as we lay ourselves entirely at His feet, we have enough light given us to guide our own steps; as the foot soldier who hears nothing of the councils that determine the course of the great battle he is in, hears plainly enough the word of command which he must himself obey.—Tryan.

THE RURAL CHURCH.

The Rev. S. S. Hepburn, D. D.

The past wonderful history of the rural parish, which is so intimately interwoven with the history of the rise of our great republic; its present feebleness and its future, appeals strongly to me. Born and raised on a farm, and during a ministry of fifty years having had charge of country churches in two dioceses, I think I may be able to speak with some degree of intelligence as to country conditions.

In Tidewater Maryland and Virginia, if one travels the main thoroughfares, he will find about every ten miles an old church building, or the site of one. Erected in the days when our nation was in its infancy, these buildings were most eligibly located, and built of the best material, good hard bricks, worked into massive walls and finished off with timber from the virgin forests. They were put up to stay, and have resisted the wear and tear of at least six generations. They are a monument not only to the piety of our forefathers, but to their good judgment and sterling characters as well. A few of them are dilapidated and the places where others formerly stood are now marked only by an old wall or a few scattering grave-stones. The leaders of that age looked after the spiritual welfare of the community.

The Revolution, together with the rise of Methodism in Maryland, and the growth of the Presbyterians and Baptists in Virginia, the unpopularity of the English clergy, and "the aroma of aristocracy" which hung around these old churches, turned the tide away from them. The parishes became very weak. In many places the church doors were closed, the buildings became the home of bats and owls, and dust settled upon the furniture. They were only silent witnesses of what had been. Bishops Moore and Meade began to stem this tide and brought about a wonderful awakening in Virginia. Tidewater Maryland had not suffered quite so badly. But even here the church field was little more than a "valley of dry bones."

The Civil War brought about another change. Virginia was prostrated financially. But her people came out of that furnace purified. Life presented a different phase; it had a deeper meaning. They had failed in the political and civil struggle, but their religious convictions had been deepened and broadened. They were determined to make the best of their opportunities. They were "down," but not ready to be "counted out" in the effort to rebuild their fortunes and put new life into the Church.

The young men who entered our ministry immediately after the war were mostly men who had been thoroughly tried on the field of battle. Twenty-two out of the twenty-five men who entered the Alexandria Seminary in 1866 were former Confederate soldiers, matured, well-seasoned men, with a fixed purpose in life. They were ready to undergo as much for their religion as they had already endured for the State. In the history of that noble institution it has never had a better class of men enrolled upon its student list. They went out from those halls thoroughly equipped in every way. Their lives have not only told upon the Diocese of Virginia, but upon the Church at large. Many of them became leaders who have written their names high in the Church's history in this land.

More old churches were revived and more new churches built in Virginia in the first two decades after the Civil War than in any other period in the history of that mother of dioceses as well as of States.

The work grew too large for one Bishop and his assistant. West Virginia was set aside, still the work was too great and Southern Virginia was created. It became necessary to have five or six bishops in the territory which was formerly covered by Bishops Meade and Johns. Richmond was then the only city of any size in this whole region. Even this city could only claim about 75,000 in population. There were numerous towns and a vast number of country parishes and churches, widely scattered, many of them almost inaccessible. Distances were great. I once asked a typical fox hunter how far it was to a point I wished to reach. His answer was "thirty-five miles, and we measure miles here with a coon skin, throwing in the tail every time for good measure." They were long miles, so much of the distance being below the surface.

Owing to the scarcity of clergy and the poverty of the country, together with the small salaries, some plan had to be worked out whereby the weak churches could be kept open.

The Diocesan Missionary Society was remodeled and so constituted that every man, woman and child became a member of it by baptism. The Executive Committee was enlarged until the most remote parish in the diocese felt it had a part in its management. It soon became the pet child of the diocese, and everybody felt it a privilege to contribute to its treasury, knowing that every dime would be well and judiciously spent. From that treasury there flowed out a regular and steady stream to the weak parishes.

Many a hard-pressed country parson in an isolated field, where he was up against a hard proposition, worn out by his long weary rides, his hands horny from milking his cow, attending his horse, working his garden and chopping wood, and with empty pockets, has had new life put into him by the arrival of his quarterly stipend from the D. M. S. It meant wiping out a debt that was eating into his very soul, new clothes for wife and children or a trip some place, where he could meet the brethren and have a day with them. Every rural priest in Virginia loves that dear old D. M. S.

As I write these words my own heart swells with emotion. In days gone by it meant more to me than I can express. Bread, meat and clothing, together with something for the dear wife, who was so patiently bearing her end of the yoke.

The employment of an evangelist (or as he is now styled archdeacon) was the next step in providing for the weak rural church. He was clothed with authority to visit all the vacant parishes, call the people together, keep the church open as often as possible, arouse in them a new spirit and put them on the trail of some one whom they could procure for a rector. Many a discouraged congregation has had new life put into it through his instrumentality. Twenty-four years of my ministry was happily spent among a people who called me to their work on the recommendation of the evangelist.

Combination of parishes was still another plan resorted to. Two or more weak parishes contiguous to each other combined in order to be able to support a rector. Some of the parsons employed in this way became the missionaries in large fields, sometimes embracing a whole county or the larger part of several counties. The writer of this article had three parishes and six churches for a period of twelve years. The services were few and far between in some of the churches. But they were kept alive and made no little growth, the support was satisfactory, and the work greatly enjoyed.

The present war has brought about conditions that place the rural church again in a trying position. There is an increasing scarcity of clergy, many having been called to the front, and the candidates for Holy Orders are bound to be fewer in number. In addition to this, the high price of labor is denuding the country almost entirely of domestic help. That class of people who are forced to give up farm life is most largely composed of the former land owner who was interested in keeping up the church. The renter who takes his place as a rule is not a churchman. So the rural parish is weakened. The future is not bright unless we can capture the young. The Sunday school is a hard thing to manage in the country in conjunction with a service for grown people. One or the other is bound to suffer. In the two parishes now under my charge we are endeavoring to surmount this difficulty by giving half our time to the children. Every other Sunday is converted into a children's day. The rector can give his entire attention to them, and follow up his teaching with an abbreviated service from the Prayer Book and a sermon they can understand.

The rural church finds its existence mainly in the States along the Atlantic coast. West of the Mississippi it is rarely known and has but little force in the Church's life. Here, where the Church first found a footing and where the rural parish has been its back-bone and sinew all these years, it is becoming weaker and weaker. The old country parishes will become the mission field of the Church. The daughter will have to support her mother. It is hoped she will not be ashamed of her in the days of her enfeebled old age.

PRESBYTERIAN TESTIMONY TO ANGLICAN USAGES.

The following passages from a recently issued book, God and the Soldier (Doran Co., $1.25), by Norman MacLean, D. D., and J. R. P. Sclater, D. D., both ministers of the Presbyterian Church who have been serving with the English forces at the front, are of especial and timely interest to members of our Church.

The volume, one of the most inspiring and suggestive books yet published on the relation of Christianity to the War, deals with such fundamental topics as "Is God to Blame," "Redemption," "Prayer," "Immortality" and "The Church." In the chapter on the Church the authors say:

"The statement of her (the Church's) purpose is simple. It is threefold. First, she exists to worship God; next, to develop Christian life amongst Christians; and, third, to extend Christ's kingdom. . . . Few will take exception to the statement that the first duty of the Church is to worship God; nor will many deny that it is a supremely important and valuable function. On the whole, the Church has aimed at meeting its responsibilities here. . . .

"At the same time weakness has been shown here; and we may not be too confident that the war has not increased the difficulties which oppose the great worship-purpose of the Church. . . . Elsewhere, respect for the traditions of the fathers had reduced what ought to be the living vividness of worship to a deadly dreariness, which was a burden of the spirit. Both of these tendencies were rightly disastrous, for they were adversely affecting the first purpose for which the Church exists. Many of us may not agree with the aims of some of our fellow-Christians in the Anglican Church; but we cannot but admit that they have done a service to us all in emphasizing the first-class importance of worship in itself. They have helped to recreate in British minds a sense of the necessity of the 'worshipfulness of worship'; and, while some of us may think that in their emphasis on the means they have forgotten the end, and that care for the symbol may obscure the great principle that all true worship must be in spirit and in truth, none of us can deny that they have done us admirable service in calling us back from an emphasis on passing ecclesiastical squabbles, or on political questions about which our prejudices are keen, to a remembrance of the fact that in worshipping God it is God that we are worshipping; and that no effort after living dignity and beauty in that enterprise is misplaced or ill-spent."

After describing the informal and "bright" services which the peculiar conditions of men in camp and trench have made necessary, the writers go on to say: "The appetite for anything that excites is easily developed, and a demand is quite certain to arise for the scrapping of the restraints of worship, and the introduction of services the chief aim of which is cheeriness."

"Against that attitude of mind, those who care for the real work of the Church must be on their guard. The assumptions on which the demand will be based are themselves unsound. For the chief of them is that you must estimate the value of an act of worship by counting heads. A manifest fallacy, which has done enough harm to worship already. That there is a real religious value of an evangelistic type in such services no one who has seen much of them can deny. But that it is proportionate to the audience no one can justly assert. The huts are filled not by worshippers, but by men who are all dressed up and have nowhere to go. . . . In abnormal conditions abnormal methods must be used; but for the steady work of the Church in days of peace, the ageless objects must be kept steadily in view. And the first object of the Church is not to 'cater' for men. It is to worship God—the God Who inhabits eternity, Whose Name is holy. And we may be perfectly certain that all the graver sections of our returning men, those sections that will count for religion in days to come, are expecting to find the note of solemn reverence and of mystery deepened in the public rites of the Church. They have learned much of the strange wonder of life; they have come close to its solemnities; and they know that the God of life is a great God, high and lifted up. While we may easily attract the thoughtless by cheaper methods (provided the local picture-house is not open), we shall alienate those who are the backbone of the nation if we turn away from the dignity which should mark our approach to God."

Passing on to that central act of worship, the authors speak thus: "An at least equally important point for consideration is whether the various branches of the Church are making the right use of the Holy Communion. The opinions of chaplains and other clerical workers amongst soldiers contradict each other on many points as to the effect the war has had on the religious life of fighting men, but there is an impressive agreement that the great Sacrament has come to signify more to them, and that Presbyterian and Nonconformist communions must alter their practices in relation to it. It has come to be seen afresh as the supremest of all occasions in the ordinary life of the Church, in which a man may draw nigh to God and be satisfied of the Real Presence of his Saviour. . . . Here, again, we are indebted to Anglicanism for restoring the central Christian rite to its proper place, although there seem to be tendencies at present within that branch of the Church which are undoing the good that has been done. . . . Either hold the Sacrament very rarely, say twice a year, and make it the culmination of a series of special services, as is still done in the Highlands; or have it very frequently, so that when a man is heavy-hearted he can immediately turn thereto for healing and new hope."

"Moreover, why should Holy Communion be hedged about with all the ecclesiastical barbed wire which at present fences it? There is much to be said for the open Communion. The purity of Church membership can be secured in endless other ways than by using entrance to the Lord's Table as the test. Why should the responsibility for the genuineness of participation not be laid upon the communicant rather than on the Church?"

Further on, one of the writers speaks of this subject again: "And I am convinced that the vast majority of genuine Anglicans in the army would never dream that it was unseemly for, let us say, a Presbyterian to share with them in their celebration; or that they were committing mortal sin in participating in a celebration according to the Scottish usage. As a matter of fact, the exigencies of active service have often compelled things of the kind to be done; and I hardly met an Anglican priest who, when faced with the question whether he would refuse the Sacrament to a Presbyterian soldier going into battle, who could not reach a chaplain of his own persuasion, replied in the negative. I have myself received the Sacrament in France at the hands of an Anglican clergyman, along with an admixture of English Wesleyans, Congregationalists and Baptists. Again and again I asked friends of my own, some of them extreme high Churchmen, whether they would refuse me if I presented myself, and the worst answer I received was, 'Don't ask me, but come.'"

The book as a whole will repay careful reading.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS FOR THE SIMPLEST KIND OF STUDY OF THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

Suggested As Preparation for the Advent Call.

(Note: The East Carolina chairman for the War Plan, or Advent Call, feeling deeply that as preparation we should place our lives by the side of the Christ's life and obey His commands "as a private obeys his captain" on the battle front today, suggested it to others who are going to follow the simple directions here given by the Rev. A. S. Lawrence, Diocese of North Carolina. This is not intended for study classes, but for most personal and secret study.)

"To a degree hitherto unknown the Church has succeeded in leavening politics, journalism, literature and social organizations with the ideas of Christianity. The standards of life and thought outside the Church have therefore risen, and the Church can only keep its leadership by a closer following of Christ. The moral greatness of our citizen army is at once a tribute and a challenge to the Church.

"After the war the Church will have a new and supreme opportunity—the finest history has provided. But it must prepare for it; and the only adequate preparation is a fresh study of the life and teaching of Christ. This must be free from both prejudice and cowardice. We must neither twist His words nor water down His teaching. We must obey His commands as a private obeys his captain, no matter where they may lead or what sacrifices they may involve. The cultivation of such creative virtues as humility and charity, accompanied by absolute loyalty to the teachings of the gospels, would give the Church the undisputed leadership of the world. Our soldiers go to mutilation and death at the command of a second-lieutenant. Shall we shrink from an equal loyalty to Christ?"—(From "The Cross at the Front.")

The Study of the Life of Christ.

In studying the life of Christ, it is first necessary to have a clear conception of what we hope to attain by that study. Is it to know more about Christ? Possibly that may be something to be attained, but surely our main purpose must be "to know Christ, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings."

Just how may this be helped by a study of the life of our Lord? Perhaps an illustration may make it clearer. We meet a public man, talk with him, and to some extent come to know him. Later we pick up some of his writings, perhaps his biography, and we read them all with interest and attention. Having read, we rightly say that we not only know more about the man, but that we feel we really know him more intimately and truly than we ever could have done simply as a result of our acquaintance.

The same thing is unquestionably true in our relations to our Lord. To some extent we have come to know Him in our experience. But we can never in this life come to the end of that knowledge. We can go on and on until we know even as we are known. And we are not seeking to know One who simply lived some two thousand years ago, but One who is alive for evermore, who went up into heaven with the same human thoughts and joys and cares that He revealed in His life, who lives now in the hearts of those who love and seek Him as really as He ever lived on earth when He was here in the flesh.

How shall we go about this study? There is the whole New Testament, there are numerous lives of Christ, there are commentaries by the hundred. There is so much material that we may well stand aghast at the mass of it. Few indeed may become great scholars, and perhaps it is just as well. Scholarship often tends to bring with it a sort of pride in such knowledge, and where pride dwells there is no room for Christ. We saw it in the Pharisees of old, and we see it now in the great German theologians.

It is well then to seek simplicity—"in singleness of heart," as the apostle says. We can hardly find a better way to know Christ than the way of the Twelve. How they came to know Him is told in its simplest form in the Gospel according to St. Mark, and there, I believe, is our best material for simple and devotional study. So-called helps to study are too often hindrances; we become so fascinated with the explanations that we lose track of what we are studying. And so I do not purpose to outline a very definite plan, but rather to give a few simple, and I hope useful, suggestions. Read the gospel straight through, slowly and carefully, trying to estimate the human character of Christ as it has been told. Compare your own life to His, noting where you have kept Him out, remembering always that it is the Person of Christ you are seeking to know, and not just His words and teachings. If the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of Christ, then the fulfilment will not come when men merely accept the principles of Christianity, but when the Person of Christ rules in the hearts and minds of all.

Having taken the Gospel as a whole, then take it up in sections—even by event, sermon by sermon, as far as possible ignoring chapter and verse divisions. Far more important than reading is meditating on what you read. And to us as a people, impatient to think and anxious to complete and finish any task we assume, meditation is by no means easy. Meditation is what Stevenson calls "busy thinking," to think over and to apply to ourselves and the world about us the particular phase of the character of Christ that we have read. Sometimes, but rarely, I believe, a commentary may be useful to clear up some obscurity, but the great thing to remember in such study as that suggested is that we are not seeking merely to know about His words and His works, but to know Christ Himself, and knowing Him, imperfectly as necessarily it must be, to so lift Him up, not only with our lips, but in our lives, that He may draw all men unto Him.

A BISHOP'S INTERPRETATION.

It is a solemn moment in our life as Christians and as citizens. But it is also an inspiring moment, for we are called upon to put into practice those principles of duty of self-denial, of sacrifice to the uttermost, which we have accepted as fundamental in our life, but which we seldom deeply feel or truly experience. Our Saviour says: "He that taketh not his cross and followeth after me, is not worthy of me. He that findeth his life shall lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." We have all been hearing Him saying these words. They have come from our pulpits with every recurring holy Lenten season. But, how much have we heeded them? How much of our life have we been willing to lose for His sake? But now our country takes up the words and becomes the preacher. Through the length and breadth of the land sounds the summons. The voice of God, using now His secular messenger, declares the same principles, reiterates the familiar call, points out the same path, demands the same supreme sacrifice, and points to the same assured spiritual prize: "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me is not worthy of me; he that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." It is no irreverence to put these words into the mouth of our country when our country calls to duty, and to sacrifice in the path of duty. Taking up the cross; following after Christ; losing and finding our life, are no vain and empty figures. Our Master is no Sophist or rhetorician. He is Man, and He calls to the spirit of man in the actual conditions of life, as in His good providence life confronts us. In so far as any human voice utters a true call to truth and to self-sacrifice, it is the Master speaking. And none of us can for a moment doubt that the call today sounding through the land, and echoing in every true and loyal heart, is a call to the service of God in resisting evil, and in establishing truth and justice, mercy and humanity in the earth. I say this is a solemn, and still more an inspiring moment, when the powers of the world feel the impulse of the spirit of Christ, and call men to count not their lives dear unto themselves, but to lay down all things before the altar of truth and duty. And the way in which men respond to this call, and without hesitation offer their lives to the sacrifice, makes me feel that this fundamental principle of the gospel enters much more largely into men's lives than we commonly suppose. Possibly it is the fault of us Christian preachers, and teachers, and leaders, that more of the spirit of ready sacrifice is not evoked in the ordinary life of the Church. Could we make our work and our methods more real, more obviously responsive to actual conditions and necessities, perhaps we should arouse greater attention and stimulate a more abundant response, in lives devoted even unto death in warfare against the many evils which degrade men, body and soul in this world before destroying their souls in any world to come.

And thus rejoicing in the noble exertions which our country is making in upholding Truth and Righteousness in the earth, let us address ourselves humbly, yet courageously, to the tasks which lie before us in maintaining the spiritual life and welfare of our people at home. All of us cannot go to war. Much more work in the aggregate needs to be done at home than on the fields of battle. We must make it our part to see that the life at home remains normal, vigorous and abundant in its manifold activities. In the infinite variety and intricacy of modern life, the part of "him who abides by the stuff" has become more important, even to the accomplishment of military achievements, than that of him who goes down to the battle. We may feel then that in all our orderly and accustomed duties we are bearing our part in our country's great enterprise.—Bishop Cheshire, Council Address.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

IX. The Missionary District; Successes and Difficulties.

The parish system has fostered self-support, but it has not been aggressive in missionary effort. Our first Missionary Bishop was sent out in 1835. The organized mission has in many cases taken the place of the parish. In a way, it has been a reaction from the parish system. Success has followed. In proportion to population we have now four times as many communicants as we had when Bishop Kemper was consecrated as our first Missionary Bishop. The country has grown rapidly, but this Church has grown more rapidly. The missionary district and the organized mission have brought success. In many missionary districts there has been larger growth than in some organized dioceses. Appeal for help has been made, money secured, and work has been done. Instead of a "call" from a parish, the election of missionaries is in the hands of a bishop who in a measure becomes responsible for the salary.

Compared with the parish system, it is a great gain. And, because of their success the number of missionary districts has been greatly increased.

But serious difficulties arise. It seems right that a bishop, supported by a Missionary Board, should have power to select the missionary clergyman. But missionary bishops are hampered for means. As a matter of seeming necessity, if he is to get the necessary means for his work he must spend a large share of his time and expend much effort to prod the wealthier parishes of the East to get the needed means.

The practice has long been deplored. It is not wise. And yet if a missionary bishop is to make a success of his work he seems to be driven to this necessity. But other serious difficulties arise that are not generally known. It is not wise that the missionary should be so absolutely dependent upon his bishop and upon his bishop's ability to raise money for his salary. Among soldiers in our United States Army, each soldier, officer or private, does not depend upon his superior officer for his appointed salary. And ought not our missionary clergy also, officers and soldiers in the army of the Church, to receive their salaries from a common fund?

A more serious difficulty, however, is of another kind. Our people generally are accustomed to the parish system. But if there be no organized parish, complaints go to the Bishop. Just complaints and unreasonable complaints and foolish complaints are poured into his ear. Polite and courteous letters, and some letters not altogether courteous, come to him. Some on one subject: some on another. The salary faithfully promised for some frivolous excuse is not being paid. And sometimes there are other subjects much more serious. The good Bishop is pestered and worried, and he has little power to help.

St. Paul dwelt two whole years at Ephesus. He did good work and was successful. Heathen people accepted Christ and gave up their idols. It injured the business of Demetrius and his craftsmen who made and sold idols.

And the missionary of today, if he become markedly successful in turning mankind from their idols of sin, may meet similar oppositions. Our country today has great business corporations. Money with them is a great object. Right and justice do not always prevail. Markedly so in the great liquor corporations and elsewhere also. If the missionary successfully raise his voice against the wrong, lo, the modern Demetrius is sent to the Bishop. Demetrius and his fellows are very religious, and they oppose the missionary who has injured their business.

The great corporation has been a supporter of the Church. Its wily, hypocritical agent makes complaint and trouble. What shall the good, earnest, but unsophisticated Bishop do?

Here are some of the many difficulties in our missionary districts. Here are reasons why clergy remain but a short time. Bishops find it hard to get suitable clergy and also hard to keep them.

Is there any way to remedy these conditions and remove the difficulties? The missionary district has in some respects proved a success, yet it is also beset with serious difficulties. How can these defects be remedied? Government by bishops is good and wise. But if their hands are tied, what then can and ought to be done?

Suggestion is made that by a comparison with methods used in United States Army and Navy and in other departments of public service some help may be found in rectifying our difficulties in the Church.

ACTIVITIES OF THE CHURCH WAR COMMISSION.

By the Secretary.

Word has been received that Bishop Perry safely arrived on the other side. Undoubtedly by this time he is at the Red Cross office in Paris. He is taking the place of Bishop McCormick, who has returned to this country on six months' leave of absence. He with his associates will have complete charge of the Red Cross chaplains in the hospitals in France, and he personally will superintend the work of the War Commission of the Episcopal Church in France.

The Rev. A. L. Washburn, recently at Base Hospital No. 1, has been transferred to an Evacuation Hospital near the front.

The following men were recently graduated from the Army Chaplains' Training School at Camp Zachary Taylor:

The Rev. Messrs. C. B. Ackley, B. J. Burt, Samuel G. Dunseath, E. A. Gerhard, A. S. Gill, H. Holt, F. G. Isley, H. E. Kelly, B. S. Levering, A. H. Marshall, D. H. O'Dowd, George Ossman, W. H. Peters, Herbert N. Tucker, Winfield H. Ziegler and S. R. West.

Notice has been received of the following appointments:

The Rev. Allan Evans, 104th Infantry, A. E. F., and the Rev. J. B. McCormick, 15th Field Artillery, A. E. F.

The Girls' Friendly Society and the Church Periodical Club have accepted the terms of affiliation with the War Commission, and they are therefore the agents of the War Commission for work in their respective departments. All suggestions and communications in regard to work among girls should be directed to Miss Belinda Wainwright, Executive Secretary, War Emergency Committee, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City. All requests for literature of any kind should be directed to Miss Mary Thomas, Executive Secretary of the Church Periodical Club, 2 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City.

SOUTHERN OPINIONS OF NEGRO EDUCATION.

Deeds blazon opinions as words cannot; and the white people of Winston-Salem, N. C., have recently expressed themselves on negro education in a somewhat spectacular fashion. The Slater Industrial and Normal School for colored students is located there, and has about 500 students yearly. Founded by the Slater Board, it has been taken over by the State of North Carolina as one of its three normal schools for negroes. It has been in operation twenty-five years—long enough to be tested by its results.

The school needed a new building for its industrial and agricultural departments; and through the efforts of the county's State Senator the Legislature appropriated $10,000 on condition of an equal sum being raised outside. The General Educational Board offered half of this.

Then the Mayor of Winston-Salem, of his own motion, called together some forty of the leading white citizens. He proposed that, in view of the value of the school's work "to Winston-Salem and the entire State," the whites of the city should give it $10,000 in proof of their appreciation of its constructive work, and of the spirit and character of its principal, S. G. Atkins. The proposal was heartily endorsed and the $10,000 quickly raised. The total amount, $25,000, was presented to the school at its recent twenty-fifth commencement. Governor Bickitt, of North Carolina, delivered the commencement address to an audience of both races, and added his testimony to the school's moral and economic value to the State.

The students and teachers, to show their appreciation of these gifts and of the school, have undertaken to raise $5,000 more, about half of which is already subscribed.

A Tennessee Board of Education.

Shelby County, Tenn., believes negro education worth providing for. Last winter the County Board of Education appropriated $60,000 for twenty-five new public schools for colored children, all of which are to be opened this fall. Shelby has a county training school for negro teachers, maintained by the County Board and the Slater Fund. Local white friends recently gave the principal $1,000 for the extension of his work. He has 450 boys in his pig club, has organized fifty-six chicken clubs, and has 400 boys each cultivating one acre for "war food."

In Person County, N. C.

The Person County Board of Education has raised the salary of every colored teacher in the county within the year. They recently offered for improvements at one colored school more than the county superintendent asked for. He declined the extra amount on the ground that the negroes themselves wished to give part of the money needed. The negroes seem to have made this an unwritten law for themselves: wherever the white people help their schools, they insist upon doing what they can for their part.

The Great Commission

Archdeacon Stuck's Journey to Point Barrow.

On February 27th Archdeacon Stuck, then on his winter journey along the Arctic coast of Alaska, wrote from Point Barrow to a friend in the United States. The letter has just reached its destination. Point Barrow is the most northerly Mission Station on the North American continent, if not in the world. The work there is carried on by the Presbyterian Church. Archdeacon Stuck says:

"The journey hither from Point Hope was hard. There can be no bleaker or more desolate country in the world, and the winds sweep over it bitterly and incessantly. For the greater part of the 350 or 400 miles our way lay along the beach—the rough sea-ice on our left hand, the low-lying, snow-covered tundra on our right. Sometimes for days together we were upon the surface of lagoons, separated from the sea by narrow sand-spits. For two days we traveled in one continuous blinding snowstorm with a perfect hurricane of wind. Fortunately it was from the south; had it been against us neither dog nor man could have faced it. The snow was driven into everything; inside our grub-box with the lid on, covered and re-covered with the sled cloth, lashed on, we found snow. Inside the pages of my diary, fastened in its leather case and the case within the hind-sack of the sled, tied down with a moosehide flap, was snow. It seems almost impossible to exclude this finely-powdered, fiercely-driven snow by any carefulness of packing. We have nothing like these storms in the interior. On other days a keen light air that cut like a knife blew against us at 30 degrees below zero. My nose was frozen so often that I cannot now tell by the sensation in it whether it is frozen or not.

"Our shelters at night were Eskimo igloos which are to be found along this coast at intervals of from twenty to thirty-five miles, often at the mouths of small rivers. Sometimes they are occupied, and then the addition of my party crowded them unconsciously so that there was no room for comfortable sleeping; sometimes they were empty and then we had to depend upon our primus stove for cooking and warmth—and were miserable enough. I should say that the chief hardship of travel on this coast is the wretched character of the night rests. If a man can be comfortable at night he can stand hard travel and exposure all day, but when his nights are cheerless as well it is tough work.

"When we reached Wainwright we had been traveling eleven days, and the kind and generous hospitality of the government teacher and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Earle Forrest, was very highly appreciated. One must travel this coast to understand what such entertainment means. For three days we lay there—the whole while a fierce snowstorm raged—and they were days of feasting and delicious rest. I held service twice for the native people, and baptized half a dozen children, and was loath to depart again. We made the 100 miles to Point Barrow in three days and are most kindly received by the old-time trader here, Mr. Brower, and by Dr. Spence and his wife, the Presbyterian missionaries.

"In the opinion of folks here our troubles will begin when we start eastward, and the chief reason is the absence of dog feed. So far we have fed our dogs upon seal meat, oogark meat (that is the giant seal), whale meat and fish of all kinds. But along the north shore the great sea mammals are not caught save in the fall, for the hunting of them can take place only when the ice parts from the shore and leaves open water—which does not happen on the north coast as it does on the west. We are facing the necessity of hauling corn meal, rice and seal oil for the greatest part of the journey, and that means heavy loads. It also means cooking for the dogs every night, and that means camping where there is drift wood, which, fortunately, is much more plentiful ahead of us than it has been behind.

"Our wait of two weeks here is as much that the season may advance and the sun climb high, as for the refreshment of ourselves and our dogs and the acquaintance with the missionary activities of this place. Leaving here about the middle of March, the long days will already be with us, and by the time (one month, I hope) that we reach Herschel Island, there will be no more than a few hours' darkness, so rapidly does the sun advance in these latitudes after the equinox is passed. Here at Point Barrow by the 20th of April it is light enough to see to shoot all night, and on the 11th of May the sun is seen at midnight. Herschel Island is, of course, farther south, but not so much farther as to make great difference."

A "Western" Oriental Woman Argues for Christianity.

"And how did you happen to become a Christian?" I asked Mme. Hirooka, a prominent Japanese.

"I wanted women to be good and I wanted to help them to improve their lot," she replied tersely. "I found that I could not accomplish what I desired without religion. That conclusion sent me to study religion from the woman's point of view. I found that there is no hope for women in any of the religions of the Orient. They teach that from the cradle to the grave women are inferior to men. They regard women as evil. Confucian ethics, for example, teach that fools and women cannot be educated. A woman cannot be a 'heavenly creature.' It teaches that it is better to see a snake than a woman, for the latter arouses passion. Japanese women have been so long oppressed by this kind of teaching that they no longer stop to ask why. They are afraid, like slaves. Then I began to read the Bible. I did not like some parts of it any better than I like the religions of the East. I did not see why any woman should call her husband 'Lord and Master.' St. Paul made me very angry. He was an old bachelor; any one can see that. He didn't know much about women. But Peter? He was fine. He had a wife, he understood women. One can see that from his epistles. When I read the gospels I found that Jesus made no distinction between the sexes. I liked that. We are all, women as well as men, children of God. I came to the conclusion that the only hope for the women of the Orient to attain their true position is through Christianity."

—From "Emancipating the Women of Asia," by Tyler Dennett, in "Asia" magazine for July.

Delegates to a Presbyterian gathering in Nagpur, Bengal, represented the 10,000 Christians who have been won, after twenty years of work, from among a tribe of head-hunters who were once so much feared that the Government would not allow the missionaries to risk their lives by going among them.

Consecration of Archdeacon Demby Postponed.

The Presiding Bishop gives notice that the order lately taken for the consecration of Archdeacon Demby, Suffragan Bishop-elect of Arkansas, on August 24th, is revoked because of difficulties in securing attendance of bishops.

The consecration probably will take place on St. Michael and All Angels' Day, September 29th.

Opening Sessions of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew Convention.

The thirty-third annual convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States opened its session August 14th at the beautiful Northfield Seminary in the foothills of the Berkshires, the birthplace, home and last resting place of Dwight L. Moody.

At the first business session, held in the main auditorium, the following officers of the convention were elected:

Chairman, Robert E. Anderson, Richmond, Va.

Vice-Chairman, Hon. F. W. Dallinger, East Cambridge, Mass.

Vice-Chairman, William A. Gallup, North Adams, Mass.

Vice-Chairman, John D. Alexander, Detroit, Mich.

Secretary, Gordon M. Reese, Lancaster, Pa.

Assistant Secretary, A. R. P. Heyes, Boston, Mass.

Assistant Secretary, A. H. Meade, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va.

At the 10 o'clock meeting of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew Conference the Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tompkins, Holy Trinity, Philadelphia, Pa., remarked the need of preparing for the return of the men after the war. His subject was "The Bible in the Personal Life of Devotion."

At 11 o'clock Dr. William H. Jefferys, for thirteen years a missionary in Shanghai, now Superintendent of the Philadelphia City Mission, spoke on "The Development of the Prayer Life." At 12 o'clock Mr. Edward H. Bonsall, President of the Brotherhood, addressed the delegates on "The Power of Personal Influence." In the twilight hour on Round Top, near the grave of Mr. Moody, the theme emphasized was "The Challenge to Christian Service in the Reconsecration of Our Lives," in an address given by Mr. James H. Falconer, of New York.

This was followed immediately by the first great auditorium service, the general theme being the progress of the kingdom, wonderfully emphasized under the subject head, "The Church and the Nation," by the Rt. Rev. Dr. John N. McCormick, Bishop of Western Michigan, and recently Chief of the Bureau of Overseas Chaplain Service, American Red Cross, who has just returned from France, where he held the vast assemblage spellbound for about two hours visualizing the conditions as he found them in the great world war.

At the second business session, at 9 o'clock Thursday morning, August 16th, the election of a new National Council took place. Mr. Robert E. Anderson, of Richmond, Va., was re-elected National Council member for the Diocese of Virginia, and Mr. W. P. Johnson, of Norfolk, Va., was elected National Council member for the Diocese of Southern Virginia.

A Letter From President Wilson.

Copy of letter received by the General War-Time Commission of the Churches from President Wilson acknowledging the receipt of bound volume containing resolutions of loyalty adopted on Memorial Day by hundreds of churches throughout the country and representing thirty-nine denominations.

The White House,

Washington, 3 August, 1918.

My Dear Dr. Speer:

I thank you sincerely for sending me the very interesting and inspiring messages from the several churches which you have been kind enough to have made accessible to me in a binding. If I followed my own impulse I would certainly reply to some of these messages, but I see only too clearly that if I began I should begin to discriminate as between one message and another or else be obliged to answer them all, which would be out of the question. I must content myself with asking you to avail yourself of any opportunity you may have to say with what interest and inspiration I have received them.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Dr. Robert E. Speer, Chairman, General War-Time Commission of the Churches, 105 East 22d St., New York.

A new worker in the missionary field has just entered upon his extensive labors in the West Indian Islands. Dr. Jose Marcial, a native of Spain, a graduate of the University of Madrid, well known in literary and religious circles, came to the United States at the request of the American Bible Society last winter. After some months of study of the society's methods and general missionary activities in these islands, he sailed for Porto Rico and we are happy to announce his safe arrival. He will visit the Virgin Islands, where the United States has assumed new responsibilities, Cuba, Haiti, where remarkable changes are taking place, and Santo Domingo, before returning to report on the needs of this extensive field. The Spanish and other Scriptures are in demand everywhere, and very wide circulation will help to increase the harmony already existing in those countries with the ideals of the United States.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Ordination.

On Thursday morning, August 15, in Emmanuel Church, Woodstock, Charles Ervine Clarkson was ordained to the Diaconate by the Rt. Rev. Robert A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop of Virginia. The Bishop was assisted in the service by his son, the Rev. Churchill Gibson, of Lexington, who read the Litany and preached the sermon, and the Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, of Berryville, who read Morning Prayer and presented the candidate for ordination.

Mr. Clarkson completed a special course at the Virginia Theological Seminary last June and since then has had charge of Emmanuel Church, Woodstock, and St. Andrew's Church, Mt. Jackson.

On Sunday morning, August 18, in Emmanuel Church, at Woodstock, Rev. Samuel A. Wallis, D. D., of the Virginia Theological Seminary, preached and administered the sacrament of the Holy Communion, assisted by Rev. Charles E. Clarkson, the newly-ordained deacon in charge.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

Uniting of Two Parishes: The Bishop has given his approval to the uniting, for a period of six months, of the parish of Calvary Church and St. Andrew's parish, Louisville. It has also been approved by the vestries of both parishes, but it will be submitted to the congregations of each Church before it is definitely decided to carry out the idea. If it is confirmed by the congregations the rector of St. Andrews, the Rev. Mr. Douglass, will be in charge of the combined churches. Mr. Douglass is now away on his vacation and the temporary uniting of the congregations will not be effective until October 1, and will last for a period of six months, but will probably be extended if found to work satisfactorily.

The Rev. Mr. Mallinckrodt, rector of Calvary Church, is the Chaplain of the Louisville troops located at Camp Shelby, Miss. He has submitted his resignation but his congregation are unwilling to accept it and feel they are doing their bit in the winning of the war by making the sacrifice of giving up their rector for work among the soldiers.

It would seem that this arrangement is a most happy solution of a very vexing problem. The services are to be alternated each month. During the month of October the combined congregations will worship in Calvary returning to St. Andrews on the first Sunday in November.

Synod of Sewanee: Definite arrangements have been made for the entertaining of the Convention of the Synod of Sewanee which meets in Louisville in November. The Rev. Mr. Douglass has been made Chairman of the Executive Committee and will have general charge of arranging for the Convention.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

In St. John's Church, Beltsville, Md., a very handsome Reredos to the memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Simms Jones (given by her children), was unveiled and dedicated on July 14 by the Rev. C. I. LaRoche.

The Reredos is of solid walnut with three Gothic panels above the altar. On the right panel is carved the Greek Cross, on the left panel the Latin Cross. The center panel is beautifully indented and flanked by two noble columns. Resting on the top of this panel is a handsomely carved Celtic Cross.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Red Cross Tent Dedicated.

There was dedicated on August 16 a Red Cross tent in Trinity yard. Its purpose is to give opportunity to women, during the noon hour and at other times, to do Red Cross work. The dedication address was made by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Manning, who said that no national act is lower in the moral and criminal scale than the firing on hospitals and hospital ships, as Germany has repeatedly done. He remarked that it was no mistake made by a nation, but an offence that has been repeated many times. He praised the Red Cross work in language quoted from General Pershing, and recorded the fact that Trinity parish rejoices that so many women come, at the noon hour, and eat their luncheon and read in the shade of the trees on the historic ground.

"It is most fitting," Dr. Manning said, "that this tent should be placed on this historic spot, close by the graves of Alexander Hamilton, Captain James Lawrence, Robert Fulton and other great Americans. We know how those men would have met the issues of this war, and we thank God that our country today is meeting the issues as they would have done.

"In this old graveyard American, British and French lie buried side by side, and today Americans, British and French with our other allies are fighting side by side for the freedom of the world.

"The doors of Trinity Church stand open to all comers 365 days in the year. This churchyard, a beneficent breathing space, stands always open to the public. We invite and welcome those who work in this downtown part of the city to enjoy the rest which it offers in the open air. Many young people come each day and we are glad that they do come, to eat their lunches here.

"If there are any who consider this desecration of a graveyard, we can only say that to us it seems quite the reverse. Many of those who come here each day will welcome the opportunity which this tent offers them to work for the Red Cross. The tent has been erected by the Red Cross and the work in it will be carried on under the direction of United States Express Building Auxiliary, No. 36.

"I hope that much work will be accomplished here. This tent in this church yard, fronting on our greatest and busiest thoroughfare, illustrates the fact that our participation in this war is an act not only of patriotism but of religious duty, that we are fighting in a sacred and holy cause and that to this cause we must give the whole strength and power of our life, spiritual, moral and material, until the brutal power which has assailed the world is completely defeated and overthrown and peace with justice is won for all men."

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. Dr. DuBose.

The Rev. Dr. William P. DuBose, for many years professor and Dean at the Theological Department of the University of the South, died on Sunday, August 18, at Sewanee.

Dr. DuBose was ordained deacon in 1864 and priest in 1865 by Bishop Davis, held charges in Winnsboro and Abbeville, S. C., and was Dean of the Theological Department of the University of the South from 1894 to 1908. He was the author of "The Soteriology of the New Testament," "The Ecumenical Councils," "The Gospel in the Gospels," "The Gospel According to St. Paul" and "High Priesthood and Sacrifice."

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop

The Church Holiday House, situated at Encampment, and established in July, is filling a long-felt want, as attested by the number of guests accepting its hospitality. The building has been repaired and fully equipped, and thrown open for the use of the clergy and Church organizations of the District. Standing in an attractive spot, but one half mile from delightful fishing streams, it has furnished a most delightful outing to many Church workers of the District, through the kindness and foresight of Bishop Thomas.

Mrs. M. Belknap, of Jackson, has been appointed President of the Little Helpers in the Missionary District of Wyoming, succeeding Mrs. R. B. W. Hutt, who resigned her office by reason of removal from the District.

The Rev. Edward M. Cross, rector of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, St. Paul, and formerly rector of St. Peter's, Sheridan, Wyoming, is spending his summer holiday in Wyoming, serving the Church at Buffalo, which was formerly under his jurisdiction as Dean of Sheridan.

The Rev. J. Coleman Horton has accepted charge of the work of St. George's Church, Lusk, Wyoming, beginning his new duties on August 1. Mr. Horton was formerly at Shoshone, Idaho.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Richard D. Wilkinson, D. D., of Lexington, Ky., has accepted a call to St. John's Church, Montgomery, Alabama, and expects to take charge about September 15.

The Rev. Robert N. Ward, rector of St. Mark's parish, Beaumont, Texas, will report on August 23d at Camp Taylor, Louisville, Ky., to undergo the training at the Training School for Army Chaplains, which covers a period of five weeks.

The Rev. Francis V. Baer has accepted a call to St. Matthew's Church, Brooklyn Manor (Woodhaven), N. Y., and expects to take up his work there September 1.

The Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Davies, D. D., Bishop of Western Massachusetts, has been requested by the War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. to represent them overseas with the American expeditionary forces in special service. Bishop Davies expects to sail within a few weeks.

Ordinations.

In the Church of the Advent, Nashville, Tenn., on August 4 the Rev. Howard Cady was advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop of Tennessee, who also preached the sermon. The candidate was presented by the rector of the church, the Rev. Prentice A. Pugh. Other clergy present and taking part in the service were the Rev. A. C. Kill-effer and the Rev. Thomas Dyke. Mr. Cady will continue in charge of the parishes at Pulaski and Cumberland Furnace, Tenn.

Mr. Alfred Barker, Senior Catechist, All Saints' Chapel, Rosebud Mission, was ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. Hugh L. Burleson, D. D., Bishop of South Dakota, at the Niobrara Convocation in Greenwood, South Dakota, August 9, 1918.

At the same Convocation on Sunday, August 11, the Rev. Joseph Dabray, Deacon of Sisseton Mission, the Rev. George S. Lawrence, Deacon of Chateau Creek, S. D., were advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Burleson.

Deaths.

The Rev. Albert Francis Tenney, rector of Christ Church, Pelham Manor, N. Y., and a professor at the General Theological Seminary, died on Saturday, August 10, aged seventy-one. Funeral services were held on Tuesday morning.

RESULTS OF VICTORY.

The conquest of the Holy Land which was the principal object of the allied army of the middle ages has come as a by-product, so to speak, of the alliance of today, and the following item from Jerusalem shows one of the first results of a Christian occupation of those places made sacred to us through Scripture:

Jerusalem, July 20.—Restoration of the Parchment Scrolls of the Law to the various synagogues in Tel Aviv and Jaffa was one of the interesting ceremonies which followed the British occupation.

These scrolls of the Law of Moses, which are all written by hand and are preserved in magnificently ornamented cases, some of them in solid silver, are the most sacred and holy possessions of every Jewish community. So when Djemal Pasha, in his hostility to the Zionists, carried out the tyrannical evacuation of the bulk of the Jewish population of Jaffa in April, 1917, the Jews carried with them these sacred Torah into exile, lest they should fall into the hands of the Turks.

These sacred scrolls had been carefully guarded by the Jews at Petach Tikvah (Mulebbis) and were brought back in solemn procession to Jaffa. A triumphal arch was erected at the northern confines of Tel Aviv, every house was decorated with flowers and bunting and the whole of the Jewish population turned out en fete to meet the return of their sacred possessions. Jews came not merely from Jaffa, but also from Richon-le-Zion and the other neighboring colonies.

The young men and the girls of the Maccabee Athletic Association dressed in white clothes, with blue sashes and ties, maintained order and kept a pathway clear for the procession through the crowds. The procession was headed by the Australian Military Band and the ceremony at the triumphal arch was attended by officers representing the Military Governor and by Dr. Weizmann and the members and officers of the Zionist Commission.

In this connection the news of the establishment of a new university on the Mount of Olives is a foretaste of things that may be expected in that ancient part of the world. This piece of news comes to us from London and reads as follows:

"The institution is to be founded by the Zionist societies of the world. While primarily for Jews, it will be open to students from all nations, Zionist authorities have announced.

"Present plans include a school of liberal arts and sciences and a school of medicine. Other branches will be added as the university grows.

"The institution will be opened as soon as conditions in the Holy Land permit.

"An attempt will be made to use the ancient Hebrew as the class-room language."

It is confidently to be expected that Constantinople will be an international city at the close of the war, and that this part of the world will again form a great meeting place for the nations of mankind, as it did in the early Christian era.

CONVICTS MAKE FINE SOLDIERS.

Elberon, N. J., Aug. 11.—Use of convicts to help win the war was strongly urged by J. G. William H. Wadsham, of New York, at the first war-work meeting of the National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor held here at the home of Adolph Lewisohn, chairman of the committee.

Judge Wadsham said that a distinction should be made between the crook, a man bent on crime, the physically and mentally defective, who are unfit for military service, and other men who, although they have violated the criminal law may, nevertheless, not be criminal in the generally accepted meaning of the term."

Each case, he said, would require special inquiry to determine.

There are 150,000 men in prison in the United States, Judge Wadsham said, and the census of 1910 showed that in one year 458,277 persons had been released from jails and penitentiaries. The utilization of this man-power, rendered negligible by the law which prevents a felon from admission to the army, he declared, was an important question.

The value of such men was shown by the records of 7,000 prisoners in the British Army, carefully tabulated for eight months. In this period 530 were killed in action; forty-nine died of wounds; thirty-one died of sickness and 1,530 were wounded. Twenty were mentioned for gallantry in action; twenty-five received the "distinguished conduct medal"; eight were commissioned, and three received the "Victoria Cross," the highest honor Great Britain confers upon a soldier and sailor.

We publish the foregoing in the hope that the suggestion here made may be taken up and followed in other parts of the country.

In many cases the crime for which a man is serving in the penitentiary has been the result of a violent outbreak of temper for which he has long since repented, and which would in no way disqualify him for service in the army.

Not infrequently the acts which lead to a criminal conviction have been committed through sheer love of adventure which is one of the best requisites for a good soldier.

Perhaps this war will give many a man opportunity to redeem himself, which otherwise might not have come to him.

BRITAIN'S SHARE IN THE WAR.

August being the month in which our mother and ally came to the rescue of stricken Belgium and surprised France, it is well to read what she has done in the cause of humanity as contained in this clipping of the New York Times:

Great Britain's contribution to the success of the Allies was made public here yesterday, on the eve of the fourth anniversary of the United Kingdom's entrance upon the war, by the British Bureau of Information of the British War Mission.

The bureau which enumerates among other things the fact that Great Britain and her colonies have raised 7,500,000 soldiers, of whom 500,000 have been slain and 2,000,000 are wounded or missing. England herself, it is said, has furnished 60 per cent. of the fighters and suffered 76 per cent. of the casualties.

British soldiers have fought on seventeen fronts in the past four years, including Belgium, France, Italy, Serbia, Greece, Russia, Palestine, Mesopotamia, China, and North, East and West Africa.

The British expenditure of rifle ammunition per week is now sixty-five times greater than the average weekly expenditure during the first ten months of the struggle. The machine gun output is thirty-nine times greater. The Ministry of Munitions now handles 50,000,000 articles a week and in addition to more than ninety arsenals, Great Britain has 5,046 Government-controlled factories, all working night and day on munitions and supplies.

The British Navy has trebled its personnel and doubled its fighting armament since entering the conflict. It and the merchant marine have transported overseas 13,000,000 men, 2,000,000 horses and mules, 500,000 cannon, gun carriages and other vehicles, 25,000,000 tons of explosives, 51,000,000 tons of oil and fuel and 130,000,000 tons of food and other stores.

The ill-omened word "kultur" comes in for a savage analysis. Professor von Seyden, in the first frenzy of the war, said: "The Germans are the elect people of the earth. They will accomplish their destiny, which is to rule the world and to guide all other nations for their common happiness."

The bureau answers von Seyden by presenting a table of the worst forms of crime committed in Germany and England during the ten years, 1897-1907, as follows:

	Germany.	England.
Murder	350	97
Incest	573	56
Rape	9,381	216
Unnatural crimes.....	841	290
Malicious and felonious wounding	172,153	1,262
Malicious damage to property	25,759	358
Arson	610	278

Total 209,667 2,557
"People of America," the author of the bureau's report says in conclusion, "you fathers and mothers, wives, sisters and sweethearts of the men you have sent to France, I ask you to study that table. Kultur should be known by its results, and, if 'benighted' England can show such a case against 'enlightened' Germany, is it not worth four years, or, if need be, forty years, of war to keep your country and ours clear of the virus of Kultur?"

We can't lock love up in our own hearts and expect to keep it. To live, it must be active.

The first real step we take toward heaven is the one we take when we say goodbye to sin.—Ex.

Thirteenth Sunday After Trinity:

The first lesson for Sunday morning is "The Song of Moses" and gives God's promises to His ancient Church, both of Discipline and of warning. The outcome would be that Israel would triumph over the world. Their superiority would be manifest even to their foes. "Their Rock is not as our Rock; our enemies themselves being judges." There is even a hint that some day the outside world, now hostile to God's people, might share in the victory: "Rejoice, O ye nations, with His people." The acceptance of this truth—a special people with a divine mission in the world—is for many today made difficult by the Kaiser's selfish scheme to force his Kultur on the world at the point of the sword and his belief in "Gott mit uns." But surely the two plans differ as heaven and hell. Of primary importance, therefore, is the fulfilment of these promises as recorded in the second lesson. Bernhardi's theory of the necessity of conflict to progress is the contention also of the Bible; but note the difference in the aim and final outcome: in the one case autocracy and rule or ruin; in the other, it is God and His truth, Christ and His Spirit that are to conquer, and not either Jews or Germans. For, writes St. Paul, "I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God to confirm the promises made unto the fathers and that the gentiles might glorify God for His mercy." And all this is to come to pass "through the power of the Holy Ghost." War has had its place in the history of revealed religion, and still has its place in the history of the world, the conflict of opposed civilizations; but peace, true peace the effect of righteousness, is the ultimate aim; and in the last analysis, "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal." The Old Testament alternate is a discourse on true wisdom and is addressed to kings and "supermen." "A sharp judgment shall be to them that be in high places. For mercy will soon pardon the meanest; but mighty men shall be mightily tormented." Moreover, it is not written "we that are strong" are to lord it over the weak, but "ought to bear the infirmities of the weak and not to please ourselves."

Another line of thought connecting the first and second lessons and related to Collect, Epistle and Gospel, is that we are helped to believe in God's promises now by the fact that history shows that God has made and kept promises in the past. Compare Deut. 32:7 ff; Romans 15:4 ff; Gal. 3: ff. The more directly practical teaching lies in the necessity of service which morally conditions the fulfilment of the promises.

In the evening the New Testament lesson, which takes the lead, is topical and is related especially to the New Covenant, which our Lord compares to new wine calling for new wine skins (perhaps the selection would end best with verse 17). This is the fulfilment of what was promised to Abraham and furnishes the theme of Epistle and Gospel. The first lesson is that passage from Hosea which climaxes in the principle that gives the Old Testament background of our Lord's discourse: "I desire mercy and not sacrifice"; a message delivered to priests by a prophet and one forevermore needed by that type of mind. The spirituality versus legalism, which is the heart of the second lesson, is treated fully by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Galatians read during the week.

Galilee.

1. How did the Galileans regard Jesus? Matt. 13:54-6.
2. What hindered them from receiving His mercies? Matt. 13:58.
3. How does Jesus feel towards those uncared for? Matt. 9:36.
4. Learn His Missionary Prayer, and use it. Matt. 9:38.
5. What did He do to help the multitude? Matt. 10:1, 5.
6. What message did He give them? Matt. 10:6-8.
7. What value did He put upon disciples' service? Matt. 10:42.
8. What was His last Missionary Command? Matt. 28:19, 20.
9. Are you praying and giving for Missions? Matt. 9:38.

"The Bible is the organ through which God still speaks to men. Its sentences are not mere echoes of a voice that is still. Its words of psalm and prophecy, of recording gospel and pleading epistle, are ever being in-breathed by the breath of God's Spirit. The words on the page or on the speaker's lips become the word of God only through the Spirit. Then they become vocal again, and they resound in the consciences and quicken the hearts of heedless men."

Self-Help.

In helping others, we also help ourselves. This truth is well illustrated by a story of two travelers in Lapland. It was a bitter, freezing day, and they were riding in a sleigh, wrapped in furs from head to foot. Notwithstand-

Collect for Saint Bartholomew the Apostle.

O Almighty and everlasting God, Who didst give to Thine Apostle Bartholomew grace truly to believe and to preach Thy word; Grant, we beseech Thee, unto Thy Church, to love that word which he believed, and both to preach and receive the same; through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

Collect for Thirteenth Sunday After Trinity.

Almighty and merciful God, of whose only gift it cometh that Thy faithful people do unto Thee true and laudable service; Grant, we beseech Thee, that we may so faithfully serve Thee in this life, that we fail not finally to attain Thy heavenly promises; through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ing this, they were almost freezing in the fearful cold.

By the wayside they happened upon a poor traveler, benumbed and freezing to death.

"Let us stop and help him," said one brother. "We may save his life." "Yes, and lose our own," replied the other. "Are we not ourselves freezing in the cold? Only a fool would think of stopping on such a day as this. I would not take off my fur coat just now to save a hundred peasants." "I am just as cold as you are," said the brother, "but I cannot see this man freeze to death without trying to save him."

He was as good as his word, got out of the sleigh, threw off his coat, and worked over the poor man by the wayside—rubbed him with snow, got him on his feet, walked him up and down vigorously, gave him wine to drink.

The effort that he made brought warmth to his own limbs. He helped the poor man to the sleigh.

"Brother," he said, "look. The old fellow is feeling better. I have saved his life, and I believe I have saved my own, for I am as warm as a toast."

But his brother did not answer. He was sitting upright in his fur coat in the sleigh, frozen to death.—Messenger, S. S. J. E.

It was Froude, the great historian of the last generation, who said: "If we wish to win respect, there is a campaign which awaits us at our very doors against swindling and cheating, against drunkenness and uncleanness, against hunger, squalor and misery, against the inhuman vices that are bred in our large cities, against the all-pervading, all-devouring love of money. We desire wealth—be it so; but not wealth in the modern meaning which in itself betrays how far we have traveled on the downward road; rather the well-being, the bodily and moral health of the people of which the nation is composed. Accept this as the first principle of action, and the plagues which are consuming us will melt away of themselves."

Restless Heart, Don't Worry So.

Dear restless heart, be still! Don't fret and worry so;
God hath a thousand ways His love and help to show;
Just trust, and trust, and trust, until His will you know.

Dear restless heart, be still; for peace is God's own smile,
His love can every wrong and sorrow reconcile.
Just love, and love, and love, and calmly wait awhile.

Dear restless heart, be brave! Don't moan and sorrow so.
He hath a meaning kind in the chilly winds that blow.
Just hope, and hope, and hope, until you braver grow.

Dear restless heart, repose upon His heart an hour.
His heart is strength and life, His heart is bloom and flower;
Just rest, and rest, and rest within His tender power.

Dear restless heart be still! Don't toil and hurry so;
God is the Silent One, forever calm and slow.
Just wait, and wait, and wait, and work with Him below.

Dear restless heart, be still! Don't struggle to be free.
God's life is in your life, from Him you may not flee.
Just pray, and pray, and pray, till you have faith to see.

Father to Son.

This war, that has brought so many frightful and brutal things to pass, has also set free the tenderest and sweetest qualities in humanity. Can anything be more charming and touching than this letter, written by an American soldier in France to his little son? The bravest are indeed the tenderest; only a man who was willing simply and courageously to offer everything—even his life—to his country could write so unaffectionately, with such gentle yet manly affection. The writer, Captain Frank W. Cavanaugh, is an officer of artillery, who was once a well-known football player at Dartmouth College.

Dear Davie Boy. Your good mother writes me that you have a chum, and she says he is a fine boy who lives next door. Isn't that fine? I wish I had a chum. You and your mother used to be my chums, and sometimes Joe and Billy and even dear little Rose Marie, and Phil, too, when he was home, but now that is all changed and I have no chum in all the world. I think it's rather sad sometimes, don't you? But I have your pictures, which I take down and talk to when I am lonesome.

I am happy to know you like your new school and home, and I'm sure you'll only play with clean boys who don't do anything very bad and who also like to go to school. Didn't we used to have great times together, and wasn't it fun when you'd come up to the car to meet me? Then when you saw me getting off, do you remember how you'd hide behind a tree and run up behind me and scare me after I had passed? And do you remember how sometimes you and I would race, and you were getting so you could run pretty fast, for you were getting to be a big boy?

And then we'd all go down to see the circus and the parade and hold hands so we wouldn't get separated or lost. And then Christmas! Oh, wasn't that a wonderful day! Early in the morning how you'd all rush downstairs to see your presents. And, then, poor, tired mother would work and work to give all you boys and girls a Christmas dinner—turkey, cranberry sauce, and dressing and plum pudding, and candy and nuts and everything. O Dave, did any little boy ever have such a good mother as you, I wonder? And now you are soon to have another Christmas, and old "Cav" won't be home. But I want you to have the finest time you ever had on that day, so that I may be happy over here thinking of you all. I wish I knew some little boys and girls over here, so that I might talk to them and hold their hands, and I would call them my boys' and girls' names and pretend that I was home.

The other night I had a lovely dream, and I was so disappointed when I awoke. I dreamed I was sitting in our kitchen with mother and David and all the children, and a chair that was tilted back against the wall slipped, and I fell gently and without hurting me to the floor. And then mother and you and all the children laughed and laughed, just like good, naughty folks. And you came over and took my hand in yours and lifted me up easily. Isn't that funny, Dave? Think of any boy lifting a big, fat father like me from the floor with one hand. Then we laughed some more, and suddenly I remembered it was after nine o'clock. I said, "Why, children, what are you doing out of bed at this hour of the night?" And you said, "Why, it isn't very often our father goes away to war, so we thought we ought to stay up to say good-by." And then I was so surprised to learn that I hadn't gone away to war yet that I suddenly awoke, only to find myself in my little, lonely barracks, and the rain was coming down hard outside, and I was lonesome for my dear family.

And now, David, old boy, everyone is in bed but me, trying to get lots of strength and health for the big fights we will soon be in, so I must do likewise and end this letter to you. You must always remember that your father came into this great war for the sake of all little children, and I know that you will, while I am gone, take good care of mother and all the children. I can see you growing up tall and straight, with shoulders back and head up, because that's what old "Cav" wants, and you love "Cav," don't you, Davie boy? Dave, will you do something real nice for me? I knew you would. Then kiss mother and Annie and Billy, Rose Marie and John for "Cav," and send one to Philip in Maine.

The lights are going out in a few minutes, so good night, good-by, Dave, and God bless you.

From your old man,

"CAV."

The Point of View.

N. B. Turner.

"Matilda," called Mr. Pockleton, "have you seen anything of my spectacles?" Since there was no reply but a busting in the kitchen, he lifted up his voice again. "Seen anything of my specs, Maria?" The question had a deprecating sound.

The bustle ceased. "No," came decisively, after while, from an ominous silence. Mr. Pockleton sighed and continued to peer and poke. When he had shaken the tablecloth for the third time and turned upside down a vase containing water, he became querulous. "I know I left them here on the mantel. I know it just as well as anything. It beats my time what becomes of things. I was reading no more than an hour ago, and—"

"Pockets?" The question was fired from the kitchen above the sound of a busy egg-beater.

"Of course, pockets. Besides, Matilda, as I've told you often—"

"Inside the almanac?"

Mr. Pockleton snorted. "Just because one single time I shut up my specs in the almanac—"

The opening door interrupted him. Mrs. Pockleton's neat gray head was thrust in, her keen blue eyes made swift inventory of the room then fixed themselves on her spouse. As his look met hers Mr. Pockleton felt vaguely disconcerted. "It's no carelessness of mine this time," he declared, on the defensive. "I haven't been out of this room since I stopped reading, and there's not a crack nor a crevice that I haven't searched." His expression was defiant. "No chance for once to accuse me of absent-mindedness, Matilda." But still her look disturbed him. "Search for yourself," he said, stiffly.

Mrs. Pockleton's face was inscrutable. "No call for searching," she said, briefly, and shut the door with business-like precision. The egg-beating began again.

"Now, what does she mean by that?" fumed Mr. Pockleton. He shook the cloth once more, angrily, and peered into a match box. "Always saying I'm in a brown study. Always laughing at my short memory—" He subsided, grumbling, and five minutes later was stretched on the lounge in the snoreful slumber of the utterly innocent. He did not stir until the voice of Mrs. Pockleton penetrated his dreams.

"Amos, Amos! Bring me the keys—the bunch with the porch-pantry key on it. Right there on the mantel, now!"

At the end of three minutes she confronted him accusingly. "I can't find 'em," Mr. Pockleton confessed. "Yes, I've looked in the key-basket a dozen times. How in the world do you expect me to see anything with my eyes gone?"

Mrs. Pockleton dipped into the basket and brought out the bunch with promptness. "When you can't use one of your senses, use another," she admonished. "My, my, but a man is a helpless creature!"

Amos was snoring again when there was another summons. He found his wife struggling with the lock of the porch-pantry. "You've got stronger hands than I have," she said. "Maybe you can pull this key out . . . It's the wrong one, for some reason or other."

Mr. Pockleton exerted himself to the utmost, but without avail. Mrs. Pockleton stood by in visible impatience; the frying apples were burning for lack of lard. "If I only had my specs," Amos groaned.

His wife's answer was full of asperity. "Well, I don't know what you want with specs for a job like that, but if you must have 'em, Amos, take 'em off the top of your head. That's such a foolish place to keep 'em that I just couldn't bring myself to tell you they were there."

Mr. Pockleton felt of his scant white hair. "Shucks, they ain't there," he said, mildly. "Them's an old pair I got hold of accidentally and couldn't see a fly through. I laid my own down to get an eyelash out of my eye and some way picked up these old good-for-nothings." He jerked at the spectacles carelessly.

A queer look of alarm flashed into Mrs. Pockleton's eyes. "Don't you hurt those specs, Amos Pockleton!" she cried, and rescued them with a jerk.

Amos looked at her in surprise. Then a light dawned in his round face. "They're—they're yours!," he cried.

"To be sure they're mine," his wife answered with dignity. But her jaw had sagged a little.

Things came to Amos slowly. "Then you've got mine," he discovered, presently. "I give you my word if you ain't! Picked 'em up when I wasn't looking." He clapped a large hand over his mouth to keep back the ill-timed mirth that shook him.

Mrs. Pockleton made the exchange neatly. "No wonder I couldn't see to unlock the door," she said. "You must have seen that something was amiss; the two pairs are nothing in the world alike. Why in the world didn't you tell me I didn't have on my own specs?" She deftly unlocked the door and hurried into the pantry.

Her husband followed her. "But, Matilda," he expostulated, "I'd like to know how I could—"

Mrs. Pockleton made a great fuss with the top to the lard tin and drowned his voice. When she turned to whisk out he grasped one apron string; for once in his life he was going to be ungenerous.

"Talk about wool-gathering," he said, "talk about brown studies and such! You looked square at my specs, Matilda, and didn't know they wasn't yours—and square through 'em and still didn't know it!" He would not let her string go. "And, moreover, you saw your own on my nose and couldn't tell 'em from a hole in the wall."

Mrs. Pockleton drew herself up severely. "Now, Amos," she admonished, "don't be feather-brained. How in the world could I recognize my specs when I was seeing 'em through yours? Answer me that."

The face of Amos fell, and the apron string dropped from his hand. He floundered mentally, then clutched at a straw. "Well, then, how in time could I—"

"There's buns in the oven," said Mrs. Pockleton, generously. "I made 'em with currants, your favorite kind."

Amos plodded through the kitchen door in her brisk wake. He still looked dazed, but he reached out eagerly for a currant bun. "Ef it don't clear off it'll rain, most likely," he said.

How the Apostles Died.

St. Peter was crucified in Rome with his head down, on a cross similar to that used in the execution of Jesus.

St. Andrew was bound to a cross.

St. James the Great was beheaded by order of Herod of Jerusalem.

St. James the Less was thrown from a high pinnacle, then stoned.

St. Philip was bound and hanged against a pillar.

St. Bartholomew was flayed to death by command of a barbarous king.

St. Matthew was killed with a halberd.

St. Thomas was shot by a shower of arrows while at prayer and afterward run through the body with a lance.

St. Simon was crucified after the manner of Jesus.

St. Mark was dragged through the streets of Alexandria until he expired.

St. Luke was hanged on an olive tree in Greece.

St. John died a natural death.

St. Paul was beheaded by command of Nero.

Judas hanged himself.

St. Barnabas was stoned to death by the Jews.

Leschetizky's Visit to the Doctor.

That famous pianist and still more famous teacher of music, Theodor Leschetizky, whose recent death has recalled many anecdotes of his career, was one of the most absent-minded of men.

One day, having experienced a slight symptom or so, transitory but disagreeable, he thought he would visit his doctor and provide against a repetition. The day was cloudy, and he started forth umbrella in hand. Before reaching the nearest avenue it began to sprinkle, and he hailed a passing street car. Settled comfortably in a corner, he sank into meditation, and was lost to material circumstances until the conductor announced, "End of the route. Passengers will please descend."

Obediently, the musician descended. He had passed the doctor's house long ago; besides, he had forgotten where he was going. A friend, who happened to pass a few moments later, found him standing on the curbstone—his umbrella up, although it was no longer raining—glowering intently at the brimming gutter as he tried to remember his errand. Explanations followed, and the friend laughingly advised him to return home, where he would arrive just about in time for his dinner, if he walked.

"Also, you will have my company all the way," he added genially. "That is to say, if you do not mind stopping a moment at Doctor So-and-so's, where I have promised to call for a prescription for my wife."

"Not at all! Not at all!" cried Leschetizky, beaming. "My dear fellow, you have told me my destination! I, too, was going to Doctor So-and-so for a prescription."

The friends proceeded to the doctor's and obtained the two prescriptions. They left together, and on the top step—the sun was now shining brilliantly—the musician paused absent-mindedly once more to put up his umbrella.

"But, my good friend, you do not need your umbrella," remonstrated his friend. "The rain ceased an hour ago."

At that moment the spring with which Leschetizky had been fumbling yielded, and the umbrella sprang open. His friend broke into a shout of laughter. When he could speak, he murmured weakly:

"True, the umbrella you have is more suitable to the weather than your own; but I am afraid the doctor's little daughter might not be satisfied with the exchange. I fear we must go back, Leschetizky, or there will be trouble."

Leschetizky lowered the supposed umbrella and looked at it. It was a blue parasol of diminutive size, much beruffled and gayly strewn with brocade pink roses!

"Yes," he agreed, "we must go back and exchange umbrellas. Besides, I must get my prescription. I put it into my purse, but I do not feel any purse in my pocket. I think I must have left it on the doctor's table."

"Leschetizky," inquired his friend, "are you quite sure you did not leave yourself behind in the car and that I am walking with your twin?"—Selected.

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

X. Jesus, Lover of My Soul.

It is probable that the words of this poem, and a certain old tune to which they were long ago set, stand in the minds of many people as somehow representative of all sacred singing. Jesus, Lover of My Soul is present in the hymn collection of every Christian church, and it is sung everywhere and on all occasions: at Morning and at Evening Prayer, in all seasons of the Church's year, in Sunday-school, at convocations, at revivals, in chapel and in home, and at the burial of the dead. It is in a way the hymn of hymns—part of the warp and woof of every soul's spiritual life.

Charles Wesley is the author of the lines. As is the case with so many poems, conflicting accounts of its origin are given. It is recorded that the stanzas were inspired by a touching experience of Wesley's. He was seated one summer day at his open window when a small, frantic bird, pursued by some feathered enemy, dashed across the sill and hid itself for safety in his breast. The second line is well in keeping with this account. Another version has it that on one occasion Wesley was compelled to flee to a small hut in the woods in order to save himself from the fury of a mob—for the Wesleys suffered all manner of religious persecution—and that while in hiding he composed his great lines.

However that may be, the poem was destined from the first for immortality. More than any other known to any Church it voices human dependence upon divine strength, and in so doing it makes universal and eternal appeal.

Jesus, lover of my soul,

Let me to Thy bosom fly,

While the nearer waters roll,

While the tempest still is high:

Hide me, O my Saviour, hide,

Till the storm of life be past,

Safe into Thy haven guide,

O receive my soul at last!

Other refuge have I none,

Hangs my helpless soul on Thee;

Leave, ah, leave me not alone,

Still support and comfort me:

All my trust on Thee is stayed;

All my help from Thee I bring;

Cover my defenseless head

With the shadow of Thy wing.

Plenteous grace with Thee is found,

Grace to cleanse from every sin;

Let the healing streams abound,

Make and keep me pure within:

Thou of life the fountain art,

Freely let me take of Thee:

Spring Thou up within my heart,

Rise to all eternity.

Whenever the furnace door opens before the Christian, it is that he may walk through it with Christ.—Ex.

Watch the Corners.

When you wake up in the morning of a dark and cheerless day,
And feel inclined to grumble, pout or frown,

Just glance into your mirror and you will quickly see

It's just because the corners of your mouth turn down.

Then take this simple rhyme,
Remember it in time,

It's always dreary weather in country-side or town,

When you wake and find the corners of your mouth turned down.

If you wake up in the morning full of bright and happy thoughts

And begin to count the blessings in your cup,

Then glance into your mirror and you will quickly see

It's all because the corners of your mouth turn up,

Then take this little rhyme,

Remember all the time,

There's joy a-plenty in this world to fill life's cup

If you'll only keep the corners of your mouth turned up.

Girls' Names and Their Meanings.

How many girls know just what their first names mean? Probably very few, and yet your own Christian name and that of every one of your acquaintances has its own special origin and significance. A few names, of course, are merely "made up," to please the fancy, but the majority have interesting histories. See if you cannot find yours in the number given below.

Mary is to all appearances the favorite name in the English language. Its direct meaning is a rather sad one—"bitter," but the name has so many sweet associations in the past that any girl should be happy to wear it. From Mary come Molly, Polly, May and Marie, Mariana, Marietta and Marian. Another name that has many derivatives is Anne, whose meaning is "the grace of God." Anne comes from Joanna, as do also Annie, Hannah, Anna, Jessie and Nancy. Elizabeth has perhaps been broken up into more short names than any name in the world: from it we get Eliza, Lila, Elsie, Bessie, Betty, Isabel, Elise and Beth, with others less well known. They all mean "oath of God," and refer to the divine covenant with Abraham. There is something very sweet about the solemn significance of Anne and Elizabeth.

Many names are taken almost directly from foreign languages. Lucy, for instance, means "light," as you will find by looking up the Latin genitive of "lux"; Flora and Florence mean "flowers," or "flowering"; Clara is "famous," and Constance is "firm."

The meaning of Frances is "free"; of Letitia or Letty, "gaiety"; of Mabel, "laughter." Helen, Nellie and Eleanor have somewhat the same significance as Lucy, since they mean "a torch." Other names have rather odd meanings, such as Philippa, "a lover of horses"; Rebecca, "a snare"; Sylvia—see your Latin again—"a dweller in the woods."

Other curiosities are the so-called animal names: Rachel, "a ewe"; Huldah, "a weasel"; Agnes and Inez, "a lamb"; Ursula, "a little bear." In addition to these we have the names that seem to refer to physical trait of the bearer, though naturally they seldom do. Pauline, meaning "small," is in this class; Celia, meaning "blind," and Gladys and Claudia, which, strange to say, are the same name in different languages, meaning "lame."

The flower names make up an attractive class all to themselves. Besides those that stand directly for flower, such as Pansy, Violet and so forth, there are Rhoda, "a rose"; Rosalie, "rose and lily"; Susanna, "a graceful white lily," and others. Names somewhat akin to these are Muriel, "perfumed," and Virginia, "spring." Sarah or Sally is a royal name, meaning "my princess"; Leila means "darkness," and Blanche—remember your French—"white." Ruth, a name that always brings to mind a lovely Old Testament character, signifies "beauty," and Margaret means "a pearl."

Many a name has a meaning that its bearer should take a pride in carrying out. Dorothy and Nathalie are two of these, "the gift of God"; Ada, Edith, Ida and Edna mean "rich gift." Adele, Alice and Ethel are "noble"; Katherine is "pure"; Sophie means "wisdom"; Eunice, "good victory," and Eugenia, "well born." Beatrice means "joy-giver"; Evelyn, "pleasant"; Grace, "thankfulness"; Phoebe, "shining"; Irene, "messenger of peace," and Pamela, "all sweetness." Suppose a family of six sisters were named Beatrice, Evelyn, Grace, Phoebe, Irene and Pamela, and each girl lived up to her name—what a happy household that would be!

If any little girl-reader finds that her name has been left out of this article, perhaps the editor of the Children's Page can furnish her with its meaning. Enclose postage for reply.

The Prince Who Was Not Hungry.

By Carolyn Sherwin Bailey.

Once upon a time there was a little prince who had very little to do, and so he thought a good deal about eating. All the grown-up people in the castle were most anxious to have the little prince grow up to be a fine, strong king. So they, too, thought a great deal about what the little prince should eat. The queen made out long lists of good things for his meals.

Such delicious foods as they were! No child but the little prince had ever tasted them.

There were wheat cakes made from only golden wheat, and honey from the wild bees' combs. There were eggs that a tiny bantam hen laid, made into an omelet with very rare herbs from the castle kitchen garden. There were tarts filled with wild strawberries or black cherries, which every one knows are the nicest cherries of all. There were such strange, sweet dishes as violet jelly, and rose-leaf jam and clover preserve, very good indeed for supper, spread on sugar wafers.

At first the little prince had a very good appetite for all these. He looked forward so much to his meals that he thought very little about running and playing with the castle pages. Instead he spent ever so much time watching the clocks, and he made up a new timetable.

"Half-past breakfast, it is now!" the little prince would say, or "A quarter before dinner," or "Ten minutes of supper." And the little prince grew so fat that he looked like a little stuffed pig.

But after a while the little prince lost his appetite. None of the goodies that they gave him tasted as delicious as they had before. He began asking for things to eat that no one could give him; a blue apple, or a mug of dew, or a pat of butter made of butter-cups.

"What shall we do about it?" all the people in the castle said. And the queen cried, and the court cook wrung his hands. The little prince would eat nothing else, and they were afraid that he would starve.

Then the little prince asked them for the best food in the world, and would have no other. He had eaten what every one thought was the best, so they did not know what to do. One day they missed the little prince. He had gone down into the village to try to find, for himself, the best food in the world.

Every one whom he met, he asked about it. Every one knew from his velvet suit and his buckled shoes that he was the little prince, so they all tried to feed him.

"Now, I have the best food in the world, a nicely roasted chicken," said the innkeeper.

"Oh, no, I have eaten roasted chicken and I am tired of it, thank you," said the little prince.

"I am sure that I have the best food in the world," said the baker, "a frosted plum cake."

"Oh, no, I have eaten frosted plum cake, and I am tired of it, thank you," said the little prince.

"Of course I have the best food in the world, chocolate ice cream," said the sweets man.

"Oh, no, I have eaten chocolate ice cream, and I am tired of it, thank you," said the little prince.

So he went this way and that way, but he could not find anything he wanted to eat.

When it was late in the afternoon, he came near to a small cottage in the woods, and near it he met a little boy of his own age, chopping down small trees. The boy's cheeks were rosy and his eyes were bright. His arms, swinging the shiny hatchet, were tough with strong muscles. He looked as he had eaten good food all his life, so the little prince spoke to him.

"Have you any of the best food in the world?" he asked.

"Oh, yes; right here in my pocket," said the boy.

"May I have some?" begged the little prince.

"Yes, indeed," said the boy. "If you will help me with my chopping first. I am not going to eat my supper until I have finished my work."

So the little prince took the hatchet and chopped while the boy tied the wood into bundles and gathered up the chips. The air was crisp and sweet, and the work made the little prince's blood flow fast and warm. He helped the boy carry the bundles back to the cottage and then he sat down on the step to rest.

"Now we will eat," said the boy, and he pulled a piece of strange, dark food from his pocket. He broke it in two and gave half to the prince, who ate it in hungry mouthfuls.

It tasted better than anything he had ever eaten before.

"It is the best food in the world. Thank you," said the little prince. "I shall see that you are made a page, and if you will give me some more I will take it back to my mother, the queen."

But the queen and all the other people were very much surprised at what the little prince brought them.

It was a piece of brown bread and butter.—Dew Drop.

Two Poems.

By Betty Page Dabney, Aged 7, Norfolk, Va.

EARLY IN THE MORNING.

In the coolness of the dawn
It is quiet on the lawn;
When the birds begin their singing
Sounds like heavenly music ringing—
Just to tell me that the day
Is now starting on her way.

THE WOODS.

In the cool green wood
Where the tall trees stood,
I love to wander down and up
And pick up each brown acorn cup.
Nearby there is a stream that's singing,
Which sounds like silver bells were ringing.

Though sometimes I may slip and fall
Yet still I know God's with us all.

(Written at "Duntora," Albemarle County, Virginia.)

The Little Turkey.

"Mrs. Wells, here is your little turkey, and it is dead," said a pitiful voice. Little Eddie, the minister's son, who was Mrs. Wells' next door neighbor, held the limp turkey in his hand as he stood in the door.

"Oh, I'm sorry!" said kind Mrs. Wells.

Eddie went home with a troubled face. Something hurt him so.

"What is the matter with my little boy?" said Eddie's mother. "All the sunshine has gone out of his face."

Eddie gave a deep sigh, then he looked up. "I'm going to tell you all about it, mamma," he said. "You know Mrs. Wells dear little chickies and turk-alurks? They looked so cunny that I just picked up one little turkey and hugged it a little bit, and it was dead. I carried it to Mrs. Wells and told her it was dead, and—and something hurts me so right in here," and he clasped his little hands over his heart.

"Was that all you told Mrs. Wells, Eddie?" asked his mother, gravely.

"Yes'm," said Eddie; but a little later she saw him trudging towards Mrs. Wells' door.

"I killed your turkey, I squeezed it so hard. Will you please to forgive me?" said little Eddie; and Mrs. Wells said, "Yes, dear. You didn't mean to kill it, I know."

When Eddie came home the sunshine was in his face again. "I told her the whole truth, mamma, and the hurt is gone," he said, gleefully.

Eddie is a minister himself now and has a little boy of his own. He teaches him very carefully, as he was taught, to tell the whole truth so that his little heart may not hurt him.—Northern Christian Advocate.

The Bad Basket.

Little Ruth and Merriam were visiting at grandma's a few weeks ago and were having the loveliest kind of a time. One morning, however, they had a quarrel over nothing at all really; but it was three long hours before the quarrel was patched up. In the meantime both little girls had cried, and both of them had been very miserable. And although both of her little visitors had been rather naughty, grandma did not scold at all. When sunshine appeared again in the house and the tears were wiped away and they had kissed one another and decided to "forget all about it," Ruth said; "I guess you think we've behaved dreadfully this morning, grandma." Mother would think so if she were here.

But grandma only laughed. "I wasn't thinking that at all," she said. "I was remembering the quarrels my little sister and I used to have when we were about as old as you and Merriam, and what my mother used to do."

"Did you used to quarrel, too?" asked Merriam in surprise.

"Not very often, but as often as you and Ruth do and in very much the same way," smilingly said grandma.

"Well, what did your mother do?" questioned Ruth.

"As soon as we quarreled," answered grandma, "we had to go into the 'bad basket' and stay there till we made up."

"The bad basket?" exclaimed both little girls. "What was that?"

"The bad basket was an old clothes basket," said grandma, laughing. "At one end was a broomstick, and fastened on the broom was an old apron for a sail; and into that basket we had to stay till our 'boat' reached the 'Land of Good Little Children.' Then we would come back again. We couldn't take any toys with us. All our toys must stay outside the basket." Grandma smiled into the two pairs of dancing eyes fixed on hers. "And, of course, very soon we began to laugh. There we were, facing each other, with nothing to play with, trying to keep on being cross; but we could not. One or the other would soon laugh; and when you laugh, away goes the quarrel. Then out we would tumble and run to mother and say, 'Here we are back again'; and mother would pretend to be very much surprised, and she would say, 'So soon?' and then we'd all laugh and forget there ever had been any quarrel."

"That was lots of fun," said Ruth, while Merriam leaned against grandma lovingly.

"Say, grandma," urged Merriam, "you write to mother and ask her to have a 'bad basket' for us when we go home."

"Have one here," said grandma. "I can find an old basket and an old apron and a broom. I'm sure." The children were delighted. The basket was rigged up; but, do you know, grandma never sent them there during the whole visit, though they played in it time after time of their own accord.

When they started to quarrel, the very thought of the "bad basket" made them laugh, and they couldn't be bad long enough to be put into the basket.—Christian Observer.

Something New About the Crab.

"Who would believe that, among creatures having well-developed domestic instincts, we must include the humble crab—the 'spiders of the sea,' as Victor Hugo calls them? Once under water, we might expect one part of the sea to be as home-like as another, but that only shows how little the average human being understands a crab's point of view. Some one, however, suspected them of the homing instinct, and so tried the experiment of catching a pair of them on the Yorkshire coast, in England, and, after marking them, carrying them south fifty miles or more, returning first one and then the other to the water at different points on the shore. Then the Yorkshire crabbers carefully searched their traps as they made each haul, on the lookout for the possible return of the wanderers. Strange to relate, one day not one but both of the crabs were caught a second time, having made their way back across the intervening miles of seabottom to their Yorkshire home."—St. Nicholas.

Riddle.

Riddlemaree, yellow or gray,
Always busy, by night, by day;
It runs and runs but it cannot walk,
It tells a lot, but it cannot talk.
It is full of good works and has a good time—

Who can unriddle this simple rhyme?

Answer to last week's riddle: A grain of corn.

The Maker of a Happy Home.

Rosalie's sunny face was clouded for once. "There's no use expecting me to be anything, Aunt Molly," she declared, dismally. "I can't go to school more than half the time since mother isn't well, and I'm not bright and smart, like the other girls. They can all paint or embroider or play the piano, but I've never had a chance to learn anything but to keep house."

"But you do that beautifully, dear?" comforted Aunt Molly. "You are making a happy home for father and mother and the boys. You make me think of a story I read yesterday!"

"A passerby said to a workman: 'You are building a good wall there. Some of your materials look rather poor, too,' glancing at a pile of rough stones.

"I don't pick my material," the man answered, simply. "What I'm here for is to build as good a wall as I can with the stuff that's brought to me."

"That is what you are doing, Rosalie; and I am sure the Master Who brings you the material is pleased with your building."

The sunshine was back in Rosalie's face.

"Thank you, auntie," she said, happily. "Now I'll go to the kitchen and build my dinner for the boys."—Selected.

As By Fire.

As the page may bear upon its surface writings traced in viewless ink, which are there, and yet are as if they were not, until the nearness of the fire shall call them out into a new distinctness, so may all truth be written on the mind of man, and yet be dead and meaningless, until called into power and being by the falling on it of these rays of the heavenly fire; and then every word of Scripture, every voice of God in His Church, every sacrament, comes forth into shape and completeness, as Christ is seen by the soul to be there.—Bishop S. Wilberforce.

God is Not Far!

God is not far from any one of us:
The wild flower by the wayside speaks
His love;
Each blithesome bird bears tidings from above;
Sunshine and shower His tender mercies prove,
And men know not His voice!

God is not far from any one of us:
He speaks to us in every glad sunrise;
His glory floods us from the noonday skies;
The stars declare His love when daylight dies,
And men know not His voice!

God is not far from any one of us:
He watches o'er His children day and night;
Each burdened heart He cheers, and lends
His might
To all who know His voice.

BACK TO HEALTH BY NATURE'S ROUTE.

This is the title of a most interesting booklet issued by the Celebrated Shivar Mineral Spring. The booklet contains the strongest letters of testimonial from men eminent in the professions of medicine, law and theology, from bankers, merchants, manufacturers and others, telling how this remarkable water has relieved them of dyspepsia and indigestion, nervous headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney and liver diseases, uric acid poisoning and other ailments due to impure blood. Sign and mail the following letter and you will have no cause to regret it.

Christian Sense and Christian Science.

"I guess I'll have to practice a little Christian Science and look on the bright side of things," somewhat playfully said a Christian woman who had met with a slight misfortune. "Not at all," was the more serious reply of her friend; "all you need to practice is a little Christian sense." That's it exactly. Paul had it when he said, "All things work together for good to them that love God," and any one who will go to the trouble of making out a list of Paul's recorded tribulations will be impressed with their seriousness and magnitude. His Christian sense was but another name for implicit Christian faith and trust. Any one who has that need not go to Christian Science for optimism any more than a man need go for water when he stands neck-deep in an exhaustless well. It is not necessary for afflicted ones to try to deceive themselves away from their afflictions in order to get comfort. Let them face their afflictions bravely, as Paul did, and look upon them as seemingly discordant notes in a grand symphony which God is adjusting to the main theme and purpose of life. Paul rode in triumph on the back of many tribulations, for he knew that they were carrying him into a glory that should be revealed hereafter. We regard it as a pitiful lack of faith in God and His providence to rely upon a false optimism rather than upon faith to meet the ills of life. What a confession of weakness to credit Christian Science with an optimism which the old faith of prophets, apostles and Christians is not supposed to have.—Selected.

Dawn Is Nigh.

Life's journey almost past,
Tottering, I stand at last
Close to the door.
Weary the way hath been,
And often sad through sin,
Now all is o'er.

The friends I walk'd beside
At noon and morningtide
Went long ago.
And evening's travel, grown
Ever more chill and lone,
Seem'd to pass slow.

Yet was it night, not day,
Thus slowly waned away—
Now dawn is nigh.
The day star's warning bright
Tells me the shades of night
All soon will fly.

Beyond that welcome door
I know—and oh, for more,
Why should I care?
I shall my Saviour see,
As now He seeth me;
Jesus is there!

"This Young Man Gripped Me."

A preacher once related that, at an evening service, a young man who had just come in from the country to see his father's grave remained after the close of the meeting to be directed to Christ, the sinner's Saviour. The minister asked him, "How did you happen to enter the church tonight?"

He answered, "I was passing, and stopped to listen to the singing, and" (pointing to one of the workers) "this young man gripped me, and took me in."

It will not be a difficult matter to fill empty seats and bring sinners and wanderers home to God if every Christian will adopt this plan, and grip somebody, and bring him or her to Christ. The command which finally secured a full table where all had begun to make excuses was "compel them to come in"; and, while hunger struggled with timidity, the gentle compulsion of a loving, earnest hand and heart turned the scale and filled the house with guests.

We may be sure there are multitudes who need and long for the great salvation of the Lord. They have had invitations from the pulpit in a general way, but no one has gripped them and said, "Come with us, and we will do you good." No one has laid hands on them, and with gentle, yet earnest and loving, entreaty brought them within the fold.

The shepherd "goeth after the lost sheep," but when he findeth it he does not content himself with mild exhortations and good advice, with pointing out the right way, and requesting the wanderer to walk in it—by no means; but when he has found the wanderer, he takes no further risk, he asks no promises, but simply lays the lost sheep "on his shoulders" and bears him home. Thus the Good Shepherd wins back the wanderer to His fold; and, imitating Him, we should seek sinners, and bring home those who have gone astray, "compelling" them to come in and share the love and blessing that is waiting for them in the Father's house.—The Christian.

There is only one source from which the enthusiasm of the gospel ministry can come, and that is a deep and ever deeper Christian life of our own. Live deeper. Let God do more for you. Be sure that you have not begun to reach the limits of what He can do. Give Him a larger liberty to help you; then the thought that any man should go unhelped by Him will seem dreadful to you, and you must speak so men will hear.—Phillips Brooks.

She was a daughter of Lloyd and Mary Rutherford Brown Thomas and niece of Governor Francis Thomas, of Maryland. She was born September 29, 1829, and had nearly reached her eighty-ninth year. Her early life was spent at "Montevue," the old Thomas homestead on the "Maryland Track," in Frederick County, Md. She was confirmed very early in life and became a member of the Episcopal Church, and ever afterward she gave her service to the Church of her choice and to the Master she loved. In early womanhood she came to make her home in Jefferson County, where her splendid endowments, of mind and of heart, soon drew to her many friends. Possessed of a vigorous and keen intellect, and a remarkably retentive memory, her strong active mind gave her a clear insight into all current events, and her splendid memory held fast hold to knowledge and facts once obtained. It was not, however, her mental endowments that made her beloved of all who knew her. They made of her a pleasing personality truly, but it was those finer qualities of the heart that bespoke a love so strong and true which made her ever ready to spend herself in service. It was also that strong Christian faith that left no room for doubt in her own mind, or in the minds of those with whom she came in close contact.

A mind so strong and clear, a heart so true and loving, a faith so pure and abiding, very truly a personality to be used by the Master through many years, that men may know that Christian womanhood and faith had not perished from off the earth.

If He has willed that I remain, and witness for Him before men;
His loving care and forethought still, will guide me to the end.

What matters, though, the way be long,
and some parts, ah! so steep,
I'll trust His word and feel secure. His promise He'll always keep.

MRS. NANCY MORRIS PAGE.

On Sunday morning, July 28, 1918, at the ancestral home of the Page family, "Kewwick," Albemarle County, Va., NANCY MORRIS PAGE passed from this life into the peace of God which passeth all understanding.

On the anniversary of the death of her beloved son, Dr. Mann Page, she was laid to rest by his side in Grace Churchyard, near Cobham, Va.

Born seventy-five years ago at "Sylvania," Louisa County, Va., she married in 1861 Thomas Walker Page, whose death occurred in 1887. She is survived by three daughters, Eleanor, Constance and Rose Page, and by two sons, Drs. James Morris and Thomas Walker Page, both professors in the University of Virginia.

Her death leaves a great emptiness in both her community and her home. Possessed of a rare intelligence which followed with keen interest all the happenings of the great world, yet it was in the home circle that the beauty of her character shone—her great heart a shelter in every storm—her tender and unfailing sympathy like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

Instead of weeping we rejoice that she who suffered much knows no more pain; she who was so tired has laid her burdens down; she who so loved her Saviour is now face to face.

For myself I can but say:

"So be my passing!
My task accomplished, and the long day done,
My wages taken, and in my heart some late lark singing
Let me be gathered to the silent West,
The sundown splendid and serene—Death."

MARY MINOR LEWIS.

To Find Rest: There are three possible ways to find rest. One of them is by cessation of work. Few can rest thus, for the pressure of unfulfilled tasks is too great. A second way is by the readjustment of burdens. The farmer rests the soil by the rotation of crops. The bookkeeper who grows weary of sitting at a desk takes his books to a higher desk and writes while standing. Indians on a long journey have the habit of picking up a log or stone and carrying it along for a distance; then when they throw it down, they feel rested. They have rested some muscles by bringing into play other muscles. The third method of finding rest is by all means the most satisfactory. It is by increase of strength. Then, whatever burdens have grown heavy, or whatever added burdens may be imposed, we are equal to the demands made upon us. "As thy days so shall thy strength be." The Master's promise of rest points to the inward reinforcement of life. "Ye shall find rests unto your souls," i. e., "I will rest you."—C. C. Albertson.

"The American Soldier in France"

A military guide-book for our troops going abroad, by Geo. N. Tricoche, late of the French army.

Read what the chief of staff says about it:

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES

Office of the Chief of Staff

(Extracts from a letter dated General Headquarters, October 15, 1917.)

"... The six copies of 'The American Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing ... and the remainder will be distributed to staff officers. ...

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover. ... Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc." ...

The Oil of Gladness.

If there is one accomplishment worth learning it is how to be glad, and how to keep so. As a department of mental and moral hygiene, it is neglected the most by those who most need it. Anybody can be glad when there is some overwhelming and obvious reason for joy. But how to be glad, so to speak, on short commons, is the attainment at present only of the wise few, and no amount of bringing it within the reach of every one seems to persuade the average man or woman to study and possess it.

There are numberless mottoes about joy which people buy and hang up and contemplate without in the least removing the habitual droop of their mouths. One of the most satiric and joyless clerks in a large business house in New York has a framed motto on his desk (where it strikes even the casual visitor with its discordance): "Be Glad You Are Alive!" and hundreds of women hang up the "Footpath to Peace" on their walls and sit and worry under it. The oil of gladness is not pressed out of mottoes, or out of oneself, it comes from losing oneself in daily living and meeting each small mercy with a grateful recognition. No self-absorbed person was ever joyful. Gladness is not a solitary growth. It is rather the oil upon the wheels of life, where the busy friction is quickest.

Real gladness makes everything easier around it, and is contagious to a degree.

Its secret is to be ready for the occasions of joy, no matter how small, as they come along. They always do. There is enough gladness of children, and sky, and flowers, and work well done, and friendship and love, and the service of God poured into every day of this round world to make any heart glad that recognizes or thinks about it. There is a daily share of it for everybody who will take it. Even in sorrowful places gladness shines, and is the sweeter for the darkness about it. Little children always find it—and it is as little children that those of a larger growth must seek it, too.—Harper's Bazaar.

Help the Man Who Shows He Deserves It.

One of our exchanges prints an editorial about a man who wrote a letter praising a young railroad man. It says: "A busy New York man returned last summer from his country home.

The station agent in that little country town had been particularly helpful to him, in caring for his trunks and arranging for the comfort of his family.

"The New York man was grateful to the station agent. He told him so. He wondered, as he rode along, what chance the young fellow had in that country station. Would any officer of the road ever pass that way? Would the lad's willingness and efficiency ever gain him a reward?

"When he reached his office he wrote a letter to the president of the railroad. 'I want to congratulate you on the young man who represents you at Smithton,' he said; 'he is courteous and intelligent, and the good will that he secures for your road in that section is worth real money to you. He is a young chap worth watching.'

"A little thing it was. The cost was only a few minutes of a stenographer's time and a two-cent stamp. Yet that letter stood out like a diamond on the president's desk amid the bundle of querulous complaints. It brightened the day in that big office. It may have changed the whole career of the young chap in the country depot."—The Lutheran.

The following ad. may be helpful to those who have friends in France. It is a clipping from the Ohio Rainbow Reveille, official organ of the 166th Infantry:

"Will trade: One pair of heliotrope hose-supporters in a holly-covered box, two pairs of gold cuff links engraved, 'To our soldier,' a dead wrist watch, seven neckties, color schemes ranging from cognac crystal to plain black, together with six classy Christmas greeting cards and some sob stuff about the brave lads in khaki. Will trade the whole batch for a can of perfectly reliable insect powder."

Better Be Considered.

A young clergyman, who was spending a holiday in a small, out-of-the-way town, went to the local barber to get shaved. The barber, like all his fellows, was a more or less loquacious soul. He showed a friendly interest in the stranger, who, by the way, was not dressed in clerical garb. He began to question him: "Stranger here, ain't you?" The parson admitted it.

"Traveling man?" said the barber.

"No," said the parson.

"You don't live here, do you?"

"No," said the parson.

"What are you doing over here?" asked the barber.

"I am supplying the pulpit," said the parson.

"Supplying the pulpit?" echoed the barber, who had apparently never heard the phrase before. "With what?"

The barber asked a most vital question. He did not intend to, but he did. The question should be well considered by all of us who preach. If a pulpit is being supplied as it should be, it will do no harm for the occupant of that particular one to review his ministry as suggested by the barber's question; and if perchance the matter of the pulpit cannot stand the gaze of a good conscience, or if the motive and manner of the pulpit back of even right preaching is unbecoming a minister of Christ, it is none too early to be awakened to such serious facts even if by the means of a coarse barber shop.—Exchange.

God must often contradict our requests, or refuse them. The answer to prayer is not promised in what way we choose, but in that which God chooses. All is determined by Him for all. But prayer must follow His will, not lead it. A refusal may be a kinder answer than a compliance. It may be needed by considerations outside our personal feelings. Refusal may come loaded with blessing which we ourselves recognize as far greater than what we sought could have been.—C. Geikie.

1693 Historic in Association;
1918 Modern in Equipment;
Progressive in Spirit;

William and Mary offers every advantage of a modern, liberal education in a cultured and historic community. Chartered by King William and Queen Mary, developed by such officials as Jefferson, Washington and John Tyler, it has for 221 years served the cause of American education. It educated John Marshal, James Monroe, Winfield Scott, George Wythe, Peyton Randolph, Jefferson and Tyler; its recent students are leaders in Virginia today.

Full Collegiate courses leading to the A. B., B. S., and M. A. degrees. Large, efficient faculty. High entrance and academic standards. Excellent laboratory facilities for the study of the natural sciences, drawing and manual arts. 12 buildings with modern equipment; heating and power plant; large shaded campus; 25 acre athletic grounds.

The College of William and Mary is the Teachers' College of Virginia; special two-year course, based on high school graduation, for the teachers' diploma. 132 scholarships for men and women training to be teachers. Free tuition to ministerial students. Special pre-medical course. All courses open to men and women.

The honor-system of student government had its origin at William and Mary. Pure religious and social surroundings; student life free from harmful and costly habits; low expenses made possible through state aid and situation in an inexpensive community.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department.

Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

If all our wishes were gratified how poor we should be!

We shall have answer too for the deeds we have not done in the body.

If God casts our sins behind His back ought we not to be willing to do likewise with the sins of others?

Faith is to believe what we do not see, and the reward of this faith is to see what we believe.—St. Augustine.

Interest in missions—home, inner and foreign—if it is to be sustained, must be fed by missionary information.

The emancipation from care and sorrow and unrest lies in that going out of ourselves which we call Love.—Maclaren.

A solemn murmur in the soul
Tells of a world to be,
As travelers hear the billows roll
Before they reach the sea.

Every Christian mother has as much of a call to preach to her children as Peter had to preach to the multitude on the Day of Pentecost.

In our pride we say we want justice, but this is the last thing that any of us should crave. If we had justice done us we should be cut off as cumberers of the ground. What we need is mercy.

I ask no dream, no prophet ecstasies,
No sudden rending of the veil of clay,
No angel visitant, no opening skies;
But take the dimness of my soul away.

It is curious to note how many people insist on having all the Christian doctrines and sacraments explained before they will accept them. And the fact that the explanations are often partial and dim seems to them a reason for disbelief. But who rebels against using electricity? And who has explained its nature and laws?—Selected.

It is a noble thing when a man grows old retaining something of youthful freshness and fervor. It is a fine thing to ripen without shrivelling, to reach the calmness of age, yet keep the warm heart and ready sympathy of youth.

Teach me to feel that Thou art always nigh,

Teach me the struggle of the soul to bear,

To check the rising tide, the rebel sigh—

Teach me the patience of unanswered prayer!

—George Croly.

There is no easy road to self-mastery. The body must be subdued, the flesh mortified, the passions crucified, the cross taken, the race run, the battle fought. Every temptation, whether gradual or sudden, must be watched against; every impediment, whether slight or serious, must be thrown aside. We are naturally proud, discontented, selfish; that higher nature, which makes men humble, sweet, self-sacrificing, does not achieve the victory without a struggle. We are naturally prone to the indulgence which makes us the slave of our lower impulses; it is only by strenuous and long-continued effort, that we can ever secure over ourselves a serene and tranquil mastery.—Dr. Farrar.

An Old Lady's Prayer.

Most Merciful God, my Heavenly Father, cast me not off in the time of old age, and forsake me not when my strength faileth. Preserve my mind from dotage and my body from protracted disease or distressing pain. Deliver me from despondency in these my declining years, and enable me to bear in patience whatever may be Thy Holy Will. And when my spirit leaves this tenement of clay, oh! God receive it. Send some of Thy blessed angels to convey my inexperienced soul to the mansions beyond: through Jesus Christ, the world's loving Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The above prayer was found after her death by the bedside of an aged woman in the Old People's Home, Muskegon, Mich.

The Secret Girding of God.

There is a statement in the Book of Isaiah which is full of consolation for the servants of God. To Cyrus, the pagan king, who was designated to deliver Israel from captivity, God said, "I gird thee, though thou hast not known me." A wonderful vista is opened up in that one word. It shows us God, the active worker, behind all the schemes of men. Cyrus knew nothing of the mysterious power that urged him on, and at one stage of his career he would flatly have denied the existence of any such power. But it was there, and operating all the same. There is nothing more strengthening than to be assured of this truth, that God is working out His own plans in His own way, and that in their accomplishment He often uses men who are in utter ignorance of the part that they play in the Divine Providence. We must look beyond Cyrus to the God who rules all things. Only as we do this can we be assured of perfect repose of mind, and the quiet power which results from perfect confidence.

Here in safety, without the excitement of battle upon us, only able to get scraps of the truth of what is going on in the vast theatre of war, many of us have been fretful, and have forgotten the stern command of Christ to His disciples in time of adversity: "In your patience possess ye your souls." Patience is the Christian duty at this time. To whom shall we turn for help, but to the fountain head of courage for all mankind. Heaviness may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.—Bishop of Niagara.

The Word of Hope.

The gospel that I love to preach is the gospel of another chance. Christ never gave up any one who did not refuse his chance. My disappointed friend, I am commissioned of God to say to you, that the best things are ahead. You may yet be a rich man, a wise man, a strong man, and all that with the riches which are not tainted and the wisdom which does not pass away and the strength that never fail-eth.—C. L. Goodell.

If we could only see the struggle in which our brave men are engaged, and the forces that are against them, I believe two things would happen. Every man and woman would go down on their knees and entreat the mercy and favour of God, and then rise and say: "That what these men are doing places a responsibility upon us that we can never forget, and that whatever it costs we shall give ourselves wholly to this cause until this tyranny be overpast."

"Soyez le bien venu
Quel est votre régime?
Restez-vous ici?
Co prenez-vous?"

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

Christ believes in us; when others shake their heads, and we ourselves are in despair, He tells us we may yet succeed. He has brought into the world the highest and best of gifts, hope. He comes to those who, as best they can, are making their bed in hell, and He tells them that heaven is theirs. It is this which has been the grand inspiration of struggling, baffled men in their strife for righteousness. Christ bids them hope: He tells them that He Himself was man, and knows what temptation means, and has seen the struggle from the combatant's point of view, appreciates the strain that is put upon them, and assures them that success is sure if they persevere.—Marcus Dods.

Conflict.

When, in the silent warfare of the soul,
With world or flesh or devil we have striven,
And conquered in the strife, and yet 'tis given,
In that same hour, to drink afresh the bowl
Of sorrow; 'tis that God our weakness knows,
And chastens not while trembling near His throne;
But when, uplifted by His love, we own
The crown of thorns a glory on our brows.
And for this purpose further, lest we hope,
In this short sojourn, for the joy and peace
Which shall come only when this life shall cease,
If we endure till death and never stoop
To shun the Hand that grieves to chasten more Than needs to fit us for the heavenly shore.

—John Hutton.

A Legend.

There is a legend told of an artist monk, that he was commissioned to paint a picture of the Saviour. As he sat before his easel to sketch the outline of his conception, he looked up and, to his joy, saw a vision of Jesus outlined against his cell wall. With reverence and whispered prayers of thanks, the artist began to paint, scarce looking at his canvas in his fear that the vision fade. And then one came to say that a poor beggar sought him at the monastery gate. The poor monk was torn with hesitation. How could he leave his vision! But he remembered the words of his Lord: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me"; and, with a sigh, he left the vision and ministered unto the beggar.

Returning to his cell, not daring to hope that the vision had remained, he raised his eyes. The little room was flooded with a strange light. Christ was there! And there came a voice, "Hadst thou not gone, I had not stayed."

The value of the army chaplain's ministry in hours of actual crisis is shown in the experience of Major James M. Black, of Edinburgh, brother of Rev. Hugh Black and a chaplain with the British forces. Writing to a friend in America, he said:

"Two Sundays ago—the dark Sunday of the German push—I was at General Headquarters taking the services. Sir Douglas Haig was there, anxious, no doubt, but very quiet. He came up and thanked me afterwards for the comfort I had given him, and he remarked, 'Remember, the battle is not ours, but God's.' He is a sincerely religious man whose faith is a big thing to him. I was glad to have been there at such a time."—Federal Council Bulletin.

PRAYER FOR VICTORY AND PEACE.

In every church in our land and on every occasion of public worship, it is almost safe to say, special prayer and intercession is made to God in respect of the war and in behalf of the country and particularly for those immediately engaged in the conflict. It would be rightly deemed a heartless and perfunctory service in which these were omitted—one in which a traditional religious performance was purposely kept as distinct as possible from the life and interests of the worshipers. In very many places special services of intercession are held at stated times for such as can attend them. Such, indeed, is probably the rule where circumstances seem to make it practicable. We may assume also that wherever private prayer is offered thoughtfully in these days of anxiety and trial the sacrifices and the great longing of a suffering world are brought to mind and laid, with the burdens of one's own heart, before God. We could hardly esteem ourselves to be Christian otherwise. And so a great volume of humble, earnest prayer is ascending night and day for our cause and its defenders to the God of the spirits of all flesh Who heareth prayer. Its fruitage who would dare to estimate! We may perhaps conceive of it as a great spiritual force lodged by our devout wills in the hands of infinite goodness and love for the accomplishment of His gracious purposes even beyond the range of our finite wisdom or desires.

In many cities, towns and villages the custom has been adopted of ringing the bells or even blowing the factory whistles each day at noon as a general call to a moment of silent prayer. We trust the custom is being extended and that it will be urged until it shall cover the land. What a simple thing it is and how fine in its simplicity that at a given hour every Christian soul should be reminded in the midst of its busy toil, its absorbing pursuits, its anxious care and burdened thoughts, to turn its face Godward and in fewest words make its requests known unto Him. The realization that at the same moment a multitude of other souls were engaged in the same pious act is a stimulus to one's purpose and an aid to recollect-edness and devotion. Imagination grasps the thought of a single aspiration, one longing urgent desire, one strong importunate plea, being sent heavenward on the wings of faith and love from thousands of hearts, a great swelling chorus in the midst of which one would not willingly stand silent. With such a unity of heart and purpose, confirmed as well as expressed again and again in this mighty impulse of common prayer, God can do gracious wonders in the greatness of His power to usward who believe.

In some such way should not every community, large or small, give communal expression to the feelings and instincts of every Christian heart therein in these momentous days; bearing its testimony, confirming its faith, welding its spiritual solidarity, even as it lays united hold upon the power and willingness of God?

But even where this custom is not observed, and to those who live apart, the noontide hour comes, and by a small effort of recollect-edness they may dispense with the signal and still join in united prayer with the country-wide company of God's remembrancers, agreeing with a vast multitude as touching that they shall ask and blending in spirit with a great congregation known only to Him, but bowing with one impulse before His footstool. That is a unity which mere propinquity or drill-work or sameness of procedure can never produce, and it is through such unity of spirit and purpose that God is doing and will do great things for this world of ours and more than answer, if He can, the highest and most daring aspirations of the hearts of His people.

THE LATE DR. DU BOSE.

In the death of the Rev. Dr. William Porcher Du Bose the American Church has lost its greatest theologian of recent years, one whose contributions to Christian thought stand in a class almost by themselves. Judging from some of his writings only, he was a scholar singularly independent of second-hand learning. He thought and studied his own way into the very heart of New Testament truth and wrote what he found there with a pen that at times seemed to stagger under its task. His books will never be popular in the ordinary sense of the word, both the style and subject-matter preclude that, but the impress of his mind will long remain upon the theological thought of the Church and will echo unrecognized from many a pulpit to the enlightenment of the hearers. In England his work is already perhaps more widely known and appreciated than in this country.

Dr. Du Bose's name identifies him with South Carolina, and his whole life was spent in the South. A graduate of the South Carolina Military Academy and of the University of Virginia, he was already a student at the old Theological Seminary of South Carolina when the War Between the States broke out in 1861. He served as adjutant in Kershaw's brigade until his ordination to the diaconate in 1864, when he served in the same command as chaplain until the end. After a parochial ministry of six years he was chosen chaplain and professor of Old and New Testament Language and Interpretation in the University of the South at Sewanee in 1871. Later he became Dean of the Theological Department and continued his unremitting labors in that institution until his retirement as Dean Emeritus in 1908. Since then, though in failing health, he has produced several books and contributed valuable articles to the religious reviews. After a long illness he passed to his reward, from the same house in which he lived when he came to Sewanee, on Sunday, August 18th, in the eighty-third year of his age.

A friend writes of him: "To all Sewanee men, he has been the living embodiment of the 'Sewanee spirit.' The influence of his life and thought, during the nearly completed half-century of his official connection with Sewanee, has been the dominant factor in shaping the ideals of that institution." It is given to few men to leave such a monument, and so enduring, as his.

WANTED: THE NAMES OF CHURCHMEN IN THE SERVICE.

At the request of the Department of Army and Navy Work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew we again call special attention to their standing advertisement on page 20 of the Southern Churchman, requesting the names and military addresses of all enlisted Churchmen. The Brotherhood Secretary for this work is disappointed that a more universal response to his request for these names is not being made. In justice to our young Churchmen going abroad in our defense, as well as to the appointed agencies of the Church endeavoring to keep this Honor Roll and to extend the ministrations of the Church to her sons on the battle line, the clergy and other Churchmen at home should see to it without fail that the name of every enlisted man from our congregation is sent to the Secretary as requested. In a personal letter he says:

"Our Church people at home should realize what a great value it is to the Church and to their boys to have these names sent to us. It is something far more than the mere keeping of an Honor Roll. We are, as you know, connecting up these boys with Church representatives in the camps and abroad as well. In hundreds of cases it means the baptism or confirmation of some young man, where it has been neglected for some reason in the parish. Through personal contact on the part of our Camp Secretary, so many things which might happen to the boy, through his inexperience, alone and away from home, are prevented and indeed a soul saved."

MILITARY TRAINING IN COLLEGES: A WISE PROVISION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

A year ago we called attention to the expressed desire of the national government that young men of the age and acquirements for college should continue their educational course, with the assurance that they would thus best serve the country and that when needed they would be called to more active duty. Very distinctly the government has had its eye on this important class upon whom so much will depend in the years of reconstruction and consolidation which are to come as well as in the great military drives which we trust will bring the war to an end within the next two or three years. They represent the resources of combined physical vigor and trained intelligence of which the country stands in greatest need today. The lowering of the draft age to eighteen years, which will doubtless be an accomplished fact before these lines are read, seemed to threaten the supply of this most necessary element, but with wise forethought the government is taking measures to conserve it as far as possible, and where it must be endangered to put it to the best military uses. College students of military age are to be enlisted, and those under eighteen will be enrolled, in a new unit to be known as the Students' Army Training Corps. The resources of the colleges will thus be combined with military discipline and training for the intensive development of these young soldiers on the lines for which they are best fitted and are most needed. Through the courtesy of Dr. R. E. Blackwell, President of Randolph-Macon College, we have the following official announcement of this plan and his own resume of its salient features.

War Department.

593 State, War and Navy Building, Washington, D. C.

General Peyton C. March, Chief of Staff, today approved, by order of the Secretary of War, a plan for the organization of a Students' Army Training Corps in the educational institutions of the country to train men as officers and technical experts in the army. The plan for the Students' Army Training Corps as altered to conform to the plans of the War Department for lowering the draft age will utilize the plant, equipment and organization of the colleges to maintain a reservoir of officer material for training, from which it will be possible to meet the enlarged needs of the various branches of the service.

The length of time during which men will be trained in the colleges will depend upon the needs of the service. As fast as one group of trained men is drawn from the colleges into the service their places will be taken by a new quota obtained by voluntary induction or through the draft. In this way the educational facilities of the country will be used to maintain a constant supply of men who are trained to meet the needs of the army.

Under the regulations provided for the Students Army Training Corps selected young men who are physically fit for military service, who are eighteen years of age or over, and who have had a grammar school education, may be voluntarily inducted into the army and enter upon a course of special training. Those who have had a grammar school education and no more will ordinarily enter special training detachments to be trained along mechanical lines of military value. These detachments will become a part of the Students' Army Training Corps and young men who prove in the course of their mechanical training that they are officer material may be transferred to a unit of one of the colleges to be prepared to enter a Central Officers' Training Camp.

Young men who have had at least a high school education will be allowed to enter the college for more advanced training as officers and as technical experts of various kinds, according to their experience and abilities. Those men who show promise under this training will be kept in college until qualified to enter Central Officers' Training Camps or to go directly into the service as technical experts. Those who do not will be sent either to Non-commissioned Officers' Schools or to the nearest Depot Brigade, or, in case they show special technical or mechanical ability, to the detachments where men are trained for such work.

Arrangements will be made for transferring from the Depot Brigades to units of the Students' Army Training Corps men whose rating in the cantonments indicate them to be officer material but not yet ready to enter Central Officers' Training Camps. Every effort will be made to give every young man who enters the service under this plan opportunity for the training best suited to his natural ability and preference in order to enable him to serve the country in the most efficient way.

RALPH BARTON PERRY,
Executive Secretary, Committee on Educational and Special Training.
Aug. 20, 1918.

Dr. Blackwell says: The objects of the new plan are thus stated by Secretary of War Baker: "First, to develop as a great military asset the large body of young men in the colleges; and, second, to prevent unnecessary and wasteful depletion of the colleges through indiscriminate volunteering, by offering to the students a definite and immediate military status.

The features of the plan are as follows:

1. Students eighteen years of age or over are to enlist. Enlisted students are in the military service of the United States, but receive no pay and are technically on inactive duty and must register. The Draft Board will not call a man as long as he remains a member of the Students' Army Training Corps.

2. Students under eighteen years of age, and those who are exempt from the draft, will enroll. Enrolled students are not in the military service of the United States, but will receive the benefits of military training without any enlistment obligation.

3. There will be each summer a camp for six weeks, and while attending this camp students will receive as pay $30 a month, and all their expenses will be paid.

4. Enlistment may be cancelled for sufficient reasons, upon recommendation of the President of the college and the military officer in command at the college.

5. Opportunity will be given for the enlisted students, who so elect, to transfer from army to navy, and vice versa, and to be assigned to active service in one of the various corps of the army upon recommendation of the college President and the proper military authority.

6. Regular uniforms, including hats, shoes and overcoats, will be furnished all members of the Students' Army Training Corps by the Government.

The last circular issued by the authorities at Washington had these significant utterances:

"Enlistment in the Students' Army Training Corps, while it does not hold out any promise of an officer's commission, is at the present time the plainest road leading in that direction.

"Should Congress lower the age of liability to immediate military service, men of the new ages not already enlisted may find difficulty in entering the service otherwise than through Draft Boards. In view of this possibility, all men expecting to enlist at all in the Students' Army Training Corps would do well to enter promptly."

This plan of the Government answers the question that every young man is asking himself, "How can I render the most valuable service to my country during the period of the war?" The Government says to him, "Enter college if you are fitted to do so, or return to college if already enrolled, and enlist in the Students' Army Training Corps."

"TURNING POINTS IN MY LIFE."

Mr. Editor: In the notice of the recent death of Dr. William Porcher DuBose, your correspondent failed to mention among his books one that will probably find delighted readers as long as any of his more learned works. Seven years ago, during the first week in August, 1911, Dr. DuBose's students held a reunion at Sewanee. There were meetings in the mornings, afternoons and evenings, the mornings being devoted to addresses by Dr. DuBose himself. These addresses, or papers, he was asked to publish. "I am willing to do this," he wrote, "chiefly because in the reunion there has been so much of a one-sided expression of obligation to myself that it is necessary to avail myself of the opportunity to say something of my own obligations in return." So with some enlargements and additions the volume was published under the title "Turning Points in My Life."

Whether our own lives have found similar turning points or not, and whether or not our thoughts and views have turned in the same direction, the book is delightful in style and spirit, as well as stimulating and helpful in its showing forth of the religious experiences of a great soul. We are taken through the author's early spiritual life, through his war experiences, and then through the influences which brought him to rest in the high ground of the Church's theology and authority. One cannot glance through the volume without the temptation to quote some of the terse and striking passages, as, for example, this in the discussion of prayer: "Nature is meant to be deficient and self-insufficient: the natural is complete only in the spiritual, and every self only in God. Therefore prayer is the breath and life of the soul: we want God as we want the air we breathe and the food we eat." This quotation is an illustration of the simple and direct style found throughout the book, even in the discussions of philosophical questions and of questions which might be called controversial.

In Dr. DuBose the Church has lost not only a loyal servant and a beautiful character, but one of her profoundest thinkers and ablest writers.

ONE POSSIBLE PURPOSE OF THE WAR.

Mr. Editor: The evolutionary principles set forth by certain philosophy have always appealed to me as more or less clever and descriptive even if they were totally inadequate to explain first causes.

Development from the simple to the complex with variety in forms in the place of uniformity is certainly a law of the natural world, it matters not

(for our argument) what have been the reasons for such variety.

Now any book on sociology will probably indicate to us the various group relations of the human race, and the process of growing unities on the one hand and growing diversities on the other. Nations have grown up and some great national principles have unified them, such as the British Empire, the United States, Russia or Germany. Yet the principle of local autonomy has developed side by side with this other movement. Unity in diversity has become manifested in these two contemporaneous movements.

Now in religion modern diversity has manifested itself in most extravagant latitude. Yet the process of consolidation has not failed to apply in this field also. Not only has Rome and the Greek Church tended to consolidate each its own adherents. The Anglican Communion has with remarkable success maintained and developed co-ordination and relation among its branches.

Great efforts like the Men and Religion Movement, the Laymen's Missionary Movement, the older Y. M. C. A., the Federation of the Council of Churches and other such organizations reveal the will of Protestantism to unify its widely diversified elements if possible and consolidate its parts effectively.

In the political and governmental field the most vigorous minds of all the continents are desiring international unity, a new organization that shall embrace all the nations, and shall cement together the peoples of this globe in a new order of common humanity that transcends all lower systems of organization. Now the war itself is a great welding agent. Religion is being cemented together, its forms are being welded, its barriers and fences are being obliterated. The real, the vital and the permanent things are standing. The needless, the insignificant, the merely sectarian, trivial or selfish are all falling away.

Likewise in a war of a score of great nations, every nation is duly recognized, each has its mode of praise and unity of command.

So a reasonable sort of international unity will certainly come out of this war. Perhaps that is God's purpose. Yet one may well be modest in saying what is the divine purpose or purposes.

In England's history the Church was unified first and then the heptarchy became consolidated into a united nation. In the United States the remarkable Federal unity of States has become perfected long ahead of religion.

Although Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth's plan for a body of chaplains authorized by Bishops and sent to minister to Christians in general, or people in general, in the army, has not been worked out in actual fact, yet it is one of the many manifestations of the desire for a united front on the part of American Protestantism.

Meantime the very Spirit of God seems to be increasing reciprocal respect between this and that body of Christians; widening and deepening the views of the man in the street in regard to his Christian brethren of all names, and making the flowers of our common Christianity spring into blossom in magnificent and munificent labor and gifts and prayers for God's blessing upon the whole race of men. Thus it is that Unity of Religion and Unity in great international harmony and peace are making progress even while great guns belch fire, noxious gas suffocate, and shells mutilate, and machine guns exterminate. So doth the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ make the knowledge of His love to cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

THE ATMOSPHERE OF RECONCILIATION.

By the Rt. Rev. Joseph Horsfall Johnson, D. D., S. T. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Los Angeles.

"Holy Father, keep through Thine own name those whom Thou hast given me that they may be one as we are."—St. John 17, 11.

In considering the questions with which we are confronted today, we ought to realize as never before that if this nation is being forced by the circumstances of the last three years to appreciate that she belongs to a family of nations, so, by the imperiousness of other circumstances, has every Christian man been forced to recognize that he is bound to concerted action with every other Christian man in the propagation of Christ's work. Life is lifting us out of ourselves as individuals and forcing upon us a consciousness of the solidarity of Christian people—simply as disciples of a common Master—which, if we are alive to it, may enable the Christian world to bring about the dominance of Christ in the present generation.

During the last few years we have heard a great deal about Christian Unity, and I believe that much that has been done in the interests of that cause has brought its blessing to organized Christianity. The influence of that movement, however, has been shown in its indirect, rather than its direct, results. One fact will serve to illustrate my statement. Long ago it became evident to me that the Church was learning, in the efforts she was making to foster this cause, where not to put the emphasis. For instance, we could all see that there was little hope for the unity of Christendom if we were to wait for that event until Christians first should have come to an agreement upon questions of philosophy, theology and ecclesiology. Such an agreement, therefore, from our viewpoint, was not to be regarded as a primary, but rather as an intermediary or final means to the end. This has been a most important admission for Christian men to make. Apparently, as I have observed, it means that many Christians, who desire the unity of Christendom, have been learning not to place very great emphasis, at the outset, upon plans for unity based upon definitions of the faith or methods of organization or administration.

Now, as I have realized the saneness of this position, I have grown to believe very strongly that if Christendom is ever to be reunited, the great stress must be laid upon the fact that the union of its parts will be dependent primarily and ultimately upon their spiritual rather than their intellectual attitude toward God and toward each other.

To sum up all this, we seem to have learned this one thing, that one literally gets nowhere by the methods of controversy, and we are beginning to realize that alone through the identification and the harmonizing of our spiritual aims and methods will the unity of the Christian Churches ever be brought about. We have discovered that however much the method of expression of a religious experience of one Christian man may differ from the method which is congenial to another, still, undoubtedly and without any question whatever, there lies behind and through every such expression an experience which actually is vital and of serious value to those who have had them. The reunion of Christendom can only begin when we honestly admit that fact. Or, to turn this thought about, the obstacle to the reunion of the Christian Churches, which for centuries have been alienated from each other, lies just at this point. It has not been so much a matter of intellectual dissent that has broken up the Christian world into sects, as an insidious, ill-concealed, unworthy skepticism on the part of Christian men everywhere as to the genuine value of the spiritual methods of religious bodies, other than their own, that has brought about this disaster.

As indicative of that fact, is it not true that it has been hard for those separated from us, trained as they have been to free, unrestrained and, not infrequently, a familiar use of sacred names, places and themes, to enter sympathetically into that spirit which we seek to cultivate when in public worship we turn our hearts and our minds with awe toward God. They seem unable to understand that this Church of ours has felt that to secure the results which, she believes, the worship of the congregation is intended to bring about, it should be characterized by such features as would appeal to a sense of solemn propriety, to a sense of reverent beauty that would be likely to evoke by its fitting and varied symbolism respect for the act of worship itself, and, as well, arouse and stimulate in all alike a sense of the seriousness of human life and of the majesty of God. Because of this unfortunate fact, many devout, religious people are impatient with the ordered routine and the stately, reserved character of our offices of public worship. For them these services seem to lack spontaneity, and because of that apparent lack they grow restive with their use and frankly express skepticism of their value. They admit their beauty, but deep in their hearts there is a question whether, after all, in the long run, they have value that makes for spirituality and for righteousness. Reunion is a long way off when this is true.

Now, when we turn this thing about and look at it from another direction, do we not occasionally find ourselves skeptical of the intellectual and spiritual seriousness of those who differ from us? Do we not grow impatient with those who, for instance, fail to recognize the value of the Church as a Divinely established organism. At times have not some of our representatives applied the epithets to them which are the synonyms for vicious self-will? And, frequently without a due regard to the facts to which I have referred, they have not implied spiritual dereliction on the part of other Christian men when they have been unable to acquiesce with us in what we believe to be the commands of our Lord? There, as I see it, has been the genesis of our suspicion, as Anglicans, of those not affiliated with us. Flippant and superficial platform lecturers have not hesitated to throw out against those who dissent from us insinuations which were ill-considered, if not unjust and unfair, and without doubt, at times, there has been shown within our own Church an invidious sense of superiority which has been as questionable in taste as is personal pride in the accident of wealth. In this Church of ours we inherit from God through our forefathers wonderful blessings, in the possession of which I rejoice, but I feel that in valuing them we should cultivate a sense of modesty: and this is the thought that I have in mind to enforce as I rejoice over the good gifts that God has transmitted to us in this our Church. In our rejoicing we should show a modest wisdom, which we have not always done. I look upon the Church as the steward of her mysteries, and this stewardship, I believe, has been granted to her for the uplift of the world. The Sacraments, for instance, were instituted as a means through which our Lord could reach out to every living man and bring him into closer touch with Himself. There is something wrong, therefore, in any theory about the Church or the Sacraments that in its operation cuts us off from, and does not bring us nearer to, every child of God, whoever and wherever he may be. And if our theory concerning these things does not do this, we, as Christian men, by an act of our wills, need quickly to get ourselves into a position where we can see and without any reserve may fairly recognize (whatever it may be our own distinction to be and whatever it may be our peculiar privilege to do for Christ) that other religious bodies beside our own are doing a splendid work for God. And what is more, we should see to it that any such admission of the distinction to which other churches may be entitled should always be divested of any ungracious suggestion of patronage that would destroy the good feeling which our admission may have aroused at the moment of its birth. What we need to do is to study the spiritual theories, practices and experiences of those who may seem to be alien to us, or to whom we ourselves may appear to be alien, that we may discover the real purpose that gives the experience so precious to them the form unfamiliar to us. In the light of such knowledge, the form, not only the unfamiliar form, but possibly the form repellant to us, may often be transformed; yes, may even be justified. In a word, it is highly important, if ever we are to get into sympathy with the things that other men think and do, that, first, we must get into sympathy with the things, really worth while, that they feel and which have prompted their thoughts and actions.

It is such a policy as this that has created for me, personally, an exceptionally agreeable relation with the men affiliated with other churches and religious bodies than my own. In fact, as the result of my policy, I have found almost everywhere a disposition, on the part of Christians of other names, to find points of agreement rather than disagreement with myself. After we have come into spiritual contact with each other, it has seemed to me that, immediately, each of us has shown a disposition to lift the emphasis from the remote corollaries of the faith, that we might find further points of contact and agreement that would deepen the harmony between us.

Now, this is the attitude favorable to the cause of the reunion of Christendom, and it is my opinion that it is the attitude that must precede reunion if it is ever to be brought about. It is not merely a tolerant attitude; for tolerance seems always to imply concessions to the other man's limitations and carries with it an unpleasant suggestion of a reserved sense of superiority. My policy I believe to be better than that. It is justice in action. It is a frank admission, whatever may be the obstacles to united action by separate Christian Communions, that there are some truths in which they are in hearty agreement, and that these truths are primary and essential factors of the spiritual life and that no religious body has a monopoly of them. At that point we stand as equals. And it has been my experience, when such a standing-ground has been reached, that we invariably yearn to get a little closer to each other. The attitude is so pleasant and agreeable that, inasmuch as each has got a new and a truer conception of the other's mental and spiritual life, we both wonder why we have not taken it before. Do you not see how favorable this is to the great cause of Christian Union? If our own Church wants to make a contribution to this cause, let it begin at this point. Let us encourage leagues of prayer, and let the leagues be so inclusive that any one who believes in God and the gospel of His Son need not be excluded from the fellowship. Let us not merely patronizingly admit spiritual excellence in others, as though any sanctity that they had attained has been an accident in the realm of grace, but let us rejoice in it as an evidence of God's actual and usual presence and power. As Christian men, if we adopt that attitude, the barriers will fall and the joy of a glorious era of peace and effective co-operation will be ushered in.

Let us, as a result of what I have said here today, make a resolution as in God's sight, that from this time on we will cease to criticize and impugn the motives of other Christian men, whether they be witnesses for schools of thought within our own Church or members of any other Church, who recognize Jesus as Master and Lord. Let us, after this, at the outset, assume our best of our fellow Christians and as well of men who profess any religion whatever. We cannot deny that God has promised to work and is working in every living soul. Let us accept that as a fact. If St. John spoke the truth in his affirmation that God is the "Word that lighteneth every man," then He is speaking not only to you and to me, and to us and to ours, but to every soul, whatever may be his ecclesiastical affiliations, and from Rome and Geneva, and through St. Thomas and St. Catherine, through Luther and through Laud, we must strive to get the message that He has been giving to men in every generation. Let us form the habit of regarding devotional men everywhere as, in a sense, message-bearers to us of the Divine Word.

This is to be the starting point, as we are working for reunion. Now, we may take a step beyond this point. Let us be so honest that we will search sympathetically for the factors in every religious system other than our own that gives, for instance, alike to the class-meeting methods among the Methodists and to those in the Historic Church who plead the atoning merits of our Lord in the mass, an influence peculiar to itself. Let us strive to find in the spiritual system with which each has been allied the secret of the sanctity of St. Francis and St. Theresa, the holiness of the Wesleys and Hannah Fry; the zeal of a Henry Martin and St. Philip Neri; the courage of a Livingston and a Judson. Surely each one and every one in his own day was in receipt, from some source, of the Divine gift that transformed and energized their lives. We know that this was so; no one questions it; but how?

That is the problem for us to study and to answer.

Now, looking toward reunion and studying that question, we must assume that every religious man is intent upon some thought or purpose that he believes to be part of the Divine plan. He may be quite wrong in his theories and we need not, nor ought we to, assent to them, but at least we may assume the honesty of his purpose, and that is the matter about which most men are sensitive. And if we do that, then he and we may be friends. Let us give every encouragement "to other men to themselves to be true," even though such loyalty to principle for a time seems to cut them off from us. In such circumstance, depend upon it, both amity and comity are not far away. In all this we shall be creating an atmosphere of mutual respect and confidence. We shall have said so much as we could say, no more and no less; we shall, therefore, have made indirection impossible, and so long as the situation remains the same, indirection will be unnecessary. We shall have learned to trust, and in that trust we shall have learned to respect, and possibly to love our fellow-man; and when that shall have been done, then we may stand upon the solid ground of the principles in which we are in agreement and where we may fraternize, and in fraternizing, we shall be sure to cultivate the habit that will, at the proper time, be willing to surrender cherished preferences that now serve as barriers between ourselves and others.

After we shall have had a generation of that sort of outlook and outreach, we may be able to take up the philosophical questions that separate us now with some hope of clearing them of their difficulties and bringing about the consummation of a reunited Christendom, for which we have been working and praying for so many years. The world may say that all this is a chimera. Well, my friends, there is comfort in the fact that it is God's chimers.

LETTER FROM BISHOP MacINNES.

The following letters from the Bishop of the Jerusalem and the East Mission of the Church of England, whose work is now calling forth so much interest, are sent us by the Rev. T. D. Harari, of Fleeton, Va.

Mr. Harari's own story is an interesting one. He is a native Syrian and was for six years a teacher in the Tabitha School, mentioned by the Bishop, the first Protestant school for girls in lower Palestine. At the outbreak of the war he was imprisoned in the Turkish barracks in Beyrout. After his release or escape he made his way to this country, and after some time entered the Theological Seminary in Virginia as a Candidate for Orders. He was ordained to the diaconate last June by Bishop Gibson and is acceptably serving a large country parish.

While at the Seminary Mr. Harari had charge of a mission and union Sunday school at Burke, Va. When Jerusalem was taken by the English troops last spring he so interested these mission children in that event that they gave upwards of ten dollars as a thank offering for Bishop MacInnes' work, which is the gift to which the Bishop refers.—Ed.

Feb. 12, 1918.

Dear Mr. Harari:

Your letter of January 1st has just reached me. I am glad to hear that you are well and that you liked the Arabic Prayer Book which I sent you.

It was indeed good to hear of the capture of Jerusalem, and we are not surprised to hear of the rejoicings in all parts of the world. Let us pray that now it has been given to God into the hands of Christians again the Holy City may become a centre from which the gospel may be sounded forth. The Palestine and Syria Relief Fund has already been enabled with the advice and co-operation of the military authorities to do a good deal to help those in distress in the south of Palestine, and we hope, with the continued support of friends in all parts of the world, we may be able to carry the relief, as the troops advance, into all parts of Syria and the north also. I am very glad to hear that you are taking an interest in the re-establishment of the work in Jerusalem. You will be glad to hear that we are already well on with plans and preparations for reopening St. Georges' School, and have had many applications for boys to enter the school.

I remain,

Yours very faithfully,
RENNIE MacINNES,
Bishop.

Dear Mr. Harari:

It was a great pleasure to me to get your letter telling of the Lent offerings your mission had sent through Dr. McKenzie to my fund, as well as of the prayers which they offer for the work in the Holy Land. Such co-operation between different communions is a very encouraging sign of vigorous Christian life.

I hope your scheme for speaking about Palestine in the Middle West will come off. As you say, people know surprisingly little about that country in America, a fact which has been remarked by the men who have come over from there to help in the relief work. I shall certainly make a note of your suggestion to send "Bible Lands" to the Anglican seminaries there. The C. M. S. hospital in Gaza has been quite destroyed, and it seems very doubtful whether it will be possible to rebuild it. The one at Jaffa, however, I am glad to say is quite all right, as well as the Tabitha Mission.

With kind regards, I am,

Yours sincerely,
RENNIE MacINNES,
Bishop.

X. Comparisons.

"Like a mighty army, Moves the Church of God."
We are not divided,
All one body we,
One in hope and doctrine,
One in charity."

See this hymn, written by Baring-Gould, and widely sung both by ourselves and in other communions. Here is the ideal, but, oh, the practice! With the many divisions of many kinds, both among ourselves and others; with our own parishes, working independently of each other, how inconsistent to say that we are not divided, even if we think that we are "one in hope and doctrine, one in charity."

And as to the comparison with "a mighty army," it is about as absurd. What army of soldiers could hope for any sort of success, divided as we in the Church are divided. Soldiers of one regiment do not fire their guns into another loyal regiment. But passing by these controversies between different bodies of orthodox Christians, see conditions among our own parishes and people.

Take some of our large cities. A Presbyterian pastor in Philadelphia, in speaking both of his own and of other communions, says:

"The city is divided into a series of over-lapping parishes. There is a steady rivalry between the different groups. Each seeks to eat up its neighbor if it can. The wealthier churches call the most attractive preacher and hire the best singers that they can, and advertise through the community that they have done so."

Shameful and humiliating rivalry and competition! A waste of energy and strength as well as of money! An army of soldiers are expected to be under proper officers, all working in harmony, and not in separate groups independent of each other, and so it should be in the Church of Christ. There has been an over-insistence on the doctrine of individual liberty. We have carried it to an extreme in allowing individual congregations to manage their own affairs, entirely independent of each other. Liberty is good, but it should be a liberty under proper restraint and control and with regard to the welfare of others.

We believe in Episcopal government. Congregational independency is showing its results in the divisions, the competition and rivalry that now abound. We need real Episcopal government. Bishops should have large power, but at the same time power guarded by constitutional limitations. To a large extent it is so guarded in our dioceses. But the hands of many bishops are so tied by want of control of moneys that their office often becomes honorary rather than real.

It is in comparison with the work of the United States Army that we may see how some improvement might be made in the work of the Church. A general in the United States Army does not raise the money to support his soldiers. He does not select, appoint or discharge his officers and men. Like himself, the commissioned officers are there for a life-time service and enlisted men are there for a term of years. He may select certain individuals for special duties, but all have their work under his direction. He does not feed his men. That and much else is done by others. He is the chief officer in command.

Are there not right here suggestions as to the power and control that might be placed in the hands of our bishops? Those words, "Like a mighty army, moves the Church of God," should be made more real.

Another comparison may be made with the United States Post-Office Department. In the main, it is efficient, though there may be some abuses and irregularities. The central authority is at Washington. Appointments for all the principal post-offices proceed from there. People in any locality may send their petitions; but they do not "call" their own postmaster, and no local body of men promise the salary of the postmaster and then fall behind in paying it, as often occurs in our church affairs.

Then see how small towns in the country are supplied with mail. See also the rural free delivery routes, by which many farmers get their mail at or near their own doors. Then see the parcels-post system; and all paid for each year without a deficit. From such a system there is much for us to learn in the government and management of our church affairs.

We are in a liberty-loving land. But we have placed more power in the hands of a President of the United States than many kings possess. The burden of the work falls on other shoulders, co-operating with him. Ought it not to be so in the Church? Larger power and responsibilities placed on bishops, but burdens placed on the laity who should count it a privilege thus to work. There are the financial burdens, and then also works of a more spiritual nature, such as have been done in recent years through the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Great Commission

Notes from Women Missionaries.

Miss Eleanor J. Ridgway, writing from the Mission of St. John's-in-the-wilderness, Allakaket, Koyukuk River, Alaska, says that her fellow-worker, Miss Koster, received a badly lacerated lip from the paw of one of our dogs and went into Tanana the first day of May after the trails were supposed to be closed. She was afraid of tetanus. I went with her to within thirty-six miles of Tanana, but there we found so much overflow water that I felt it was best for her to go on alone, and I came back. We had left here with two dog teams and two of our boys, so it was easy for her to go on with one. She was showing no signs of poison, so I felt that she could go on the last day alone with the one boy, for that was the safe end of the trail. She went to the post surgeon, Dr. Leonard, and he took stitches and she has come home very well indeed and rested. Miss Rountree took very good care of her at our hospital in Tanana.

"Soon after I arrived here a sick native woman was brought down from South Fork. I was sorry that Miss Koster was not here; but I knew I could not spend time being sorry, so went to work with what knowledge of remedies I have and helped her to get well on her way to recovery ere the ice went out. This year I kept school for one month later than usual, as we had sixteen school children in the village. As I was alone, it was not practical to be going to and from the school-house, so we held it in the kitchen. The school children are bright little things and all tried to be very good because, as one little boy said, 'You are with us alone.' However, I did not feel lonesome once. You see, this month's stay alone was nothing like last year's stay alone, for this year there were many in the village, whereas last year I was here for one month and five days absolutely alone save for my dogs. Our people were kindness itself to me, and I can truly say that I love them more the longer I know them. These natives are doing very well and are trying to do what is right in their way. I do not feel discouraged about them. Of course, sometimes things are not as smooth as at other times, but you know that is likely to occur almost any place."

One of the woman members of the mission staff in Alaska, on returning from a furlough in this country to a station that has been closed for two years, says:

"I am here, but I cannot say I am located—the mosquitoes and the mice require too much activity. I really can be thankful for water in the house. The pump is rather eccentric in its action, but the water is clear and pure. I have made my cache reasonably secure from the mice, and hope that I can make it fit to receive my supplies when they come. At present I am living simply enough to satisfy Mr. Hoover. That is not a hardship. Getting rid of the mice and making the house livable is hard. The natives are glad to have the mission reopened. They are all away now for the king salmon run. I see some women who look promising. They will take to lace-making, I am sure. My boxes are not here, but we can do nothing until the summer work is done. The people do not speak as the Tanana Indians, although they are said to be the same stock. I shall not use the knowledge I gained of the Prayer Book. I have just investigated a disturbance at my front door, and found a porcupine scratching to get in. I am told he will catch mice. If he were only catchable, how glad I should be to make a companion of him."

Miss Sarah E. Conway, of Liberia, has returned safely to her station at Cape Mount. Last autumn Miss Conway was obliged to leave the field on account of ill health. She spent a few months in the Canary Island. Much difficulty was experienced, owing to German submarine activity, in getting a steamer for the mainland. Finally, on March 4th, Miss Conway secured passage in a Spanish boat for Fernando Po, a small island off the west coast of Africa, but about 1,000 miles east of Liberia. After making this long detour and waiting several weeks for a north-bound boat, Miss Conway finally sailed for Freetown, about 250 miles north of her destination. From there she made her way inland to Cape Mount, arriving there five months after sailing from the Canaries. She was obliged to travel about three times the distance of the islands from Liberia and twice steamed past Cape Mount and Monrovia without being able to land.

A Great Agency of the Kingdom: The British and Foreign Bible Society has not suspended business or reduced its output "for the period of the war." For its last fiscal year, the one hundred and eleventh year of its history, the number of volumes issued was 9,387,182. Scriptures were issued in 504 languages and were distributed in practically every land. Even in Berlin, Vienna and Budapest the society's work has been maintained. In China alone 3,000,000 copies were distributed. This great agency of the kingdom is helping to prepare the world for the coming of lasting peace.

Job found plenty of time to offer burnt offerings for each one of his ten children, because he went at it early in the morning.—Ex.

Opening Day of the Theological Seminary.

The ninety-fifth annual session of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia will open on Wednesday, September 18, 1918. Entrance examinations will begin at 10 o'clock in the morning of that day. All prospective students, and students taking examinations, should be at the Seminary promptly on the evening of Tuesday, the 17th of September, as the Seminary dining-room will be open on that day for supper at 6:30 o'clock. Lectures will commence in all classes on Friday morning, the 20th of September.

SAMUEL A. WALLIS,
Secretary of the Faculty.

Activities of the Church War Commission.

I have received the following from the Atlantic Division of the American Red Cross:

"Dear Sir:

"Referring to your letter of August 13th, we have been advised today that a cable has been received from overseas instructing that no more chaplains are to be enrolled for Red Cross service and that those now in the Red Cross service will be taken over as army chaplains, providing they are qualified, or assigned to some other department of the work. We are accordingly discontinuing the enrollment of any chaplains.

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "ERIC ALLEN,"
"For Bureau of Personnel."

The above information corroborates the rumor that has been prevalent for some time to the effect that the army was about to take over Red Cross chaplains and give them army commissions. It is not certain as yet how this order will be interpreted in detail. The War Commission will make a statement as soon as it has accurate information in regard to the facts. It might be said, however, that this action is in consequence of a determination on the part of the War Department to unify, or gather under its own control, those who are serving in any branch of war work.

The Executive Committee met in Boston on August 16th. It discussed the new order of the War Department by which civilian chaplains are deprived of their privileges. The Executive Committee does not feel that it can take any definite action in regard to this order, inasmuch as it has not yet received definite instructions as to the manner in which the order will be interpreted. The Committee is thoroughly alive to the critical situation. In the meantime the Secretary is sending the following letter to all bishops and civilian chaplains:

"At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the War Commission, held on August 16th, there was a thorough discussion of the recent War Department order, by which the privileges of the civilian chaplains are to be withdrawn and in which they are given three months, beginning July 24th, for the completion of their work.

"Inasmuch as the Executive Committee is unable, as yet, definitely to say how strictly the War Department or the local commanding officers will construe this order, it is unable to give any specific advice to civilian chaplains and others at work in the camps. It would, however, suggest that no more civilian army chaplains be appointed and that those recently appointed and not as yet at work in the camps, do not leave their parishes or engage supply for such parishes until they have assurance from the commanding officer of the camp in which they intend to work that their position for a definite period shall be granted.

"The Executive Committee would also advise those at present acting as civilian chaplains to continue at their posts until otherwise ordered by the commanding officer, in the meantime making such preparations as may seem wise for the conclusion of their work and for the return to their former occupation.

"The Executive Committee would also assure civilian chaplains that they shall not suffer financially in consequence of the action of the War Department."

In addition to these matters the Executive Committee has organized its relationship with the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and the Girls' Friendly Society, and has taken certain steps toward further organization with the Joint Social Service Commission and the Board of Religious Education. The details of affiliation between the War Commission and these various agencies for war work will be published shortly.

The Executive Committee has voted that each student at the Army Chaplains' Training School at Camp Zachary Taylor shall receive from the War Commission $100 for equipment. This applies to the men graduated from the school on August 15th as well as to those of future sessions.

It was also voted that all commissioned chaplains overseas should be allowed monthly a sum not exceeding $100 for miscellaneous purposes connected with their regiments, such sum to be provided by Bishop Perry from the fund at his disposal in Paris.

All matters relating to church buildings were tabled, pending the interpretation which the War Department will give to the present order depriving civilian chaplains of their privileges.

The Rev. Adelbert J. Smith was appointed chaplain at Kingston Avenue Hospital, Brooklyn, term of service to begin September 1st.

One thousand dollars was appropriated for the Joint Social Service Commission for social and religious work in production communities.

Two Hundred French Girls for American Colleges.

One of the most unique and important links in binding our country to France is now being forged in the arrangements under way for bringing French girls to American colleges. This plan, formulated by the Association of American Colleges, with the hearty cooperation of both the French and United States Bureaus of Education, has met with a tremendous response, both on the part of the colleges offering the scholarships and French girls applying for this privilege. In fact, the Committee of the Association has already visited several of the larger French cities conferring with applicants, and while over 200 scholarships have been offered the Committee finds many more than that number of promising girls who wish to avail themselves of this privilege.

So heartily is the French Government in sympathy with this project that they have appropriated between ten and twelve thousand dollars in order that no deserving young lady may be disappointed in her desire for an education in our country. The girls selected are highly qualified, thoroughly imbued with the plan of the French people at a time when France is displaying the most remarkable qualities ever called forth in a nation, and it will be a real privilege for our students to associate with them. The colleges are to be congratulated and should be supported in every way for their courtesy and generosity in this plan.

Y. M. C. A. Workers Still Wanted.

Representatives of the War Personnel Board of the Y. M. C. A. are touring the country in individual search for men to go overseas. At least three hundred men a week are needed, and not that number are secured. The need is even greater because of the Russian situation and the decision of President Wilson to send a deputation into Siberia. The Board holds that men selected now, without previous Association experience, are unfit to be sent to Russia, and so efforts are making by the Board to induce Association secretaries in some of the largest American cities to drop their work at home and go to Russia immediately. Only a few have yet been induced to do so. Twenty-five hundred men are needed in all of the fields, France, Italy and England, before September 1st.

The Association says it is finding an encouraging number of men who are both able and willing to bear their own expenses. Some others accept merely home support for dependents, without pay for themselves. These together number about half of all who are sent, it is said, or nearly that striking proportion. A reason for the demand for men is the vast amount of supplies handled weekly by the Association huts. A further reason is the necessity to maintain the moral tone. Volunteers are found in every part of the country, but the Middle West has thus far made, it is said, the most remarkable showing, with New England and the Pacific Coast a close race. Greater burdens are being heaped upon the Association all of the time, so the hard workers in the New York headquarters say.

The Twenty-sixth Annual Conference of the Foreign Mission Boards of Canada and of the United States will be held at the Garden City Hotel, Garden City, Long Island, N. Y., January 14-16, 1919.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Proposed University for the Women of Virginia.

The Merriwether Lewis Memorial Board of Ivy, Va., of which the Rev. F. W. Neve is President, and Mr. Allen N. White, of Ivy, Va., is Secretary and Treasurer, are appealing to the citizens of the State and elsewhere for aid in the erection of a memorial to Merriwether Lewis, the explorer of the Lewis and Clarke expedition of 1804-05. The memorial will take the form of a building to be used, and it is hoped endowed, as a public school for the community, at a cost of $75,000.

It is hoped that later the means will be provided whereby this shall grow into a Women's University. The Governor of the State and other prominent persons have expressed their interest in the undertaking.

The Soldiers', Sailors' and Marines' Club, conducted by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew at 505 East Grace Street, Richmond, is sending a circular letter to its supporters showing what has been done during the past year and asking for a renewal of subscriptions that the directors may know how to proceed in making their plans for the year to come. During the past nine months the club has ministered to the welfare and comfort of about eight thousand soldiers, sailors and marines. A Government uniform is a sufficient badge of admittance to all the many advantages and conveniences which the club has to offer. It has also been the means of introducing hundreds of soldiers into the private homes of Richmond where they have received hospitalities. Funds have been carefully dispensed and expenses reduced to a minimum. About four thousand dollars will be needed for the conduct of the club for another year.

The Rev. Charles E. Clarkson, who was ordained to the diaconate on August 15th by Bishop Gibson, will take charge for one year of St. Paul's Parish, Hanover, in the absence of the Rev. William B. Lee, Jr., who is a Chaplain in the Army.

The Rev. Kensey J. Hammond, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper, recently held a very successful nine-day mission in Leeds Parish, Fauquier County, for the rector, the Rev. William Meade.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, and Chaplain of Base Hospital No. 45, has arrived safely overseas, according to a cable received in Richmond on August 22d.

The Sunday School of St. Mary's Church, Goochland County, recently sent $8.75 to Madame Anderson's Orphanage in Paris for children orphaned by the war.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomsen, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. Floyd S. Cartwright, of Beaufort, S. C., has entered upon his duties as rector of Christ Church, Smithfield.

The Rev. Durlin S. Benedict, LL. D., who has been rector of Emmanuel Church, Bristol, and St. Thomas' Church, Abingdon, for about four months, has resigned and accepted a government position in Washington.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. J. T. Clark, rector of Christ Church, Clarksburg, is now in the regular army, having refused to accept exemption as a clergyman. His vestry has granted him a leave of absence for the period of the war and will see that his pulpit is supplied during his absence.

The Rev. Willis M. Cleaveland, of Springfield, Ill., has been called to St. Paul's Church, Weston.

The Rev. Dudley Boogher, rector of the Memorial Chapel of the Good Shepherd, Parkersburg, has been called to Trinity Church, Martinsburg.

The Rev. Albert N. Slayton, of Uniontown, Pa., has been called to the rectorship of St. John's Church, Charleston.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Death of the Rev. William Strother Jones, D. D.

The Rev. William Strother Jones, D. D., of the staff of St. Thomas's Church, New York, N. Y., died at his old home in Alexandria, Va., on August 19th after a brief illness.

Dr. Jones was born in Fauquier County, Va., in 1852, the son of Major James Fitzgerald Jones and Ann Lewis Marshall. He attended William and Mary College and Washington and Lee University, and was a graduate of the Virginia Theological Seminary. Was ordained deacon in 1876 and priest in 1877 by Bishop Whittle. Washington and Lee University conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity on him in 1894. He served parishes in Casanova, Va., Owings Mills, Md., Fairfield, Conn., Trenton, N. J., and Erie, Pa., becoming an assistant at St. Thomas's, New York, in 1912. He was one of the well-known clergymen of the Church, having been delegate to the General Conventions of 1904, 1907 and 1913. His work as chairman of the committee which raised a fund of nearly $40,000 made the foundation of the Diocese of Erie possible. He was chairman of the first Standing Committee of that Diocese and received a flattering vote on the election of its first Bishop. He offered prayer in Congress at the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Chief Justice Marshall, of whom he was a great-grandson. He was a Knight Templar and a thirty-second degree Mason and was active in Masonic work, and was also chaplain of the Confederate Veterans' Association of New York.

Dr. Jones married Kate U. Smoot in 1876. Mrs. Jones died in 1886 and he then married Minnie O. Smoot in 1888. He is survived by Mrs. Jones and three sons, J. Smoot Jones, who is in the Quartermaster's Department, Washington; W. Strother Jones, who is in the Naval Reserve Officers' Supply School at Pelham Bay, N. Y., and Lieutenant E. Harrah Jones, who is at present on the U. S. S. Wilkes, in European waters.

The funeral was conducted in St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, on August 21st by the Rev. Floyd S. Leach, Ph. D., of St. Thomas's Church, New York, assisted by the Rev. Wallace E. Rollins, D. D., and the Rev. Angus Crawford, D. D., of the Virginia Seminary; the Rev. Milton A. Craft, of Grace Church, Trenton, N. J., and the Rev. Edgar Carpenter, of Grace Church, Alexandria. Interment was in St. Paul's Cemetery, Alexandria.

He had all the high characteristics of a Virginia gentleman, a fine servant of Jesus Christ, and in his ministry never swerving from the evangelical and catholic principles laid down in the Book of Common Prayer founded on the teaching of the Word of God. In all his parishes he was the beloved pastor, the faithful and earnest preacher, and the diligent leader of the various parochial agencies which have sprung up in these later days for the better accomplishment of the general work of the Church. He saw the end of his work, then calmly waited during days of declining health, resting in faith upon the rich promises of God, until his charge came.

Personal Notes

The Rt. Rev. T. P. Thurston, D. D., of Eastern Oklahoma, who was operated on recently for appendicitis at the Hill Crest Hospital, Minneapolis, Minn., is doing very well, and expects to be back in his own district in about a month.

The Rt. Rev. Francis K. Brooke, D. D., Bishop of Oklahoma, is seriously ill at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Edward H. Lee, 1353 North State Street, Chicago.

The address of the Rev. C. E. Buxton, of St. Mary's Church, Madisonville, Ky., has been changed to Covington, Va. Mr. Buxton has taken charge of Emmanuel Church there.

The address of the Rev. William S. Claiborne, formerly of Chattanooga, Tenn., is now Captain Chaplain William S. Claiborne, Evacuation Hospital No. 2, France. All mail intended for the Archdeacon of Tennessee should be sent to the Rev. T. S. Russell, Cleveland, Tenn.

The Rev. C. R. Bailey, Ph. D., rector of St. Ann's Church, Revere, Mass., is in charge of Emmanuel Church, Wakefield, Mass., during the month of August and over the first Sunday in September.

The Rev. Howard S. Hartzell, of Philadelphia, who has been serving for two years at Leaksville and Spray, N. C., with the Rev. William J. Gordon, has been appointed by Bishop Cheshire to the charge of St. Stephen's Church, Duke, N. C., and entered upon his duties on July 1st. Mr. J. Preston Burke, a recent graduate of the Western Theological Seminary, has taken the work vacated by Mr. Hartzell.

The Rev. James M. Collins has accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Atonement, West Philadelphia, Pa., and will assume charge on September 1st.

The Rev. Frederick H. Handsfield has accepted a call to the Church of the Ascension, Rockville Center, L. I., and will enter upon his new duties on October 1st.

The Rev. George W. Lay, D. D., will have charge of Christ Church, Springfield, Mass., until the return of the rector, the Rev. J. W. McGann, who is with the Y. M. C. A. in overseas work. Dr. Lay preached for the first time on August 25th.

The Rev. William H. Pettus, rector of St. James' Church, West Somerville, Mass., finished his course of training at the Training School for Chaplains, Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville, Ky., and was commissioned a first lieutenant and chaplain in the United States Army on August 15th, and will report for duty early in September at Camp Eustis, Va.

The Rev. E. H. Merriman is now the Church's clerical representative at Camp Grant, Ill., vice the Rev. F. E. Wilson, who is leaving for France as an army chaplain. Communications relating to men of the Church at Camp Grant should be addressed either to Mr. Merriman or to Mr. E. A. Farmer, at Y. M. C. A. No. 2, Camp Grant, Ill.

The Rev. W. T. Allan, minister in charge of Ballinger and Coleman, Tex., returned to Ballinger and resumed his duties on August 28th.

The Rev. J. S. Littell, D. D., who has been rector of St. James' Church, Keene, N. H., since 1906, has resigned to accept the rectorship of St. James' Church, West Hartford, Conn., and the position of editorial secretary of the Church Missions Publishing Company of Hartford. His work with this company will in a degree be combined with the work of the American Society of Church Literature, which he founded four years ago.

Deaths.

The Rev. George Venable Fowler, a colored minister of the Diocese of Washington, died at the Freedman's Hospital, Washington, August 2d. He was ordained deacon in 1916 and priest in 1917 by Bishop Harding, and his whole ministry was spent at St. Monica's Chapel. Funeral services were held at St. Monica's Chapel on August 5th, and the body was taken to Key West, Fla., for burial.

The Abundance of God.

When does God move backwards? When does God give less and less to the children that disobey Him? Whenever did the Lord cry, It is enough; further blessing you cannot have? Take all types and illustrations supplied in the Biblical history, and we shall ever find that the supply on the part of God never failed. Bring forth vessels now, said the prophet, and fill them; and they came to the last but two, the last but one, the very last of all; and when it was full the oil ceased. Plenty of oil for the vessels, none for the floor; plenty for use, none for waste. It is our vessels that give out; it is not the oil of Divine love that is exhausted. I will do better, better. It is the refrain of the Divine song of Divine government. We never touch the horizon; as we approach it recedes. So we never touch the fulness of Divine blessing. Answered prayer is only another promise that the next prayer shall have a larger answer if itself represents a larger capacity and a larger love.—Joseph Parker.

The great lack of our life is that we do not pray enough. And there is no failure so disastrous or criminal as this. It is very difficult to account for it. If in all times of discouragement and vicissitude we could have access to one of the wisest and noblest of our fellow-creatures, or to some venerated departed saint, or to the guardian angel deputed to attend our steps, or to the archangel that presides as vice-regent over this system of worlds, how strong and brave we should become. Whatever our need, we would at once seek his august presence, and obtain his counsel and assistance. How extraordinary is our behaviour, then, with respect to prayer, that we make so little of our opportunities of access into the presence of our Father, in whom wisdom, love and power blend perfectly, and who is always willing to hear us—nay, is perpetually urging us to come!—F. B. Meyer.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

STRAWS.

At Reno, Nev., this month there was a meeting of bankers and prominent mine owners of the metals used for coins, and at this meeting was discussed the possibility of the universal adoption of a uniform currency system based upon the decimal system of money and to be used by all the nations now allied against Germany.

Almost simultaneously a conference was going on in Paris between Hon. Herbert Hoover and the Food Administrator of France, England and Italy to arrange for equal distribution of food-stuff throughout these four greatest allied countries. From this conference a statement was issued suggesting that around these four national departments of food could be built the most permanent union of these nations which should last after the war and become the basis of a great international coalition for the preservation of peace.

From Sheffield, Eng., comes a new song for the American Expeditionary Forces, written by Mrs. Savage, wife of the American Consul-General in that city, the chorus of which runs as follows:

United now the nations stand, divided they'll ne'er be,
In friendship true their hands are clasped across the mighty sea.
The sentiment that binds them fast is gold without alloy
And Tommy greets right cheerily his ally, Attaboy!

Which points to the permanence of the friendship and unions which now exists among the allied soldiers.

In July there met at Prague a congress of the oppressed peoples with delegations of Poles, from Prussia, Silesia and Poland, of Czechs and Slovaks of Hungary of Croates and Serbs, of Jugo-Slavs and Slovenes and of Rumanians, Transylvanians and Dalmatians. This body issued a report that is most interesting in many respects, but particularly in the following paragraph:

"The assembled representatives unanimously declare that a better future for this nation is to be founded and durably assured on the firm basis of world democracy, real and sovereign government by the people, and a universal alliance of nations vested with the authority of arbitration."

Thus we see straws floating from Reno, Nev., to Prague in Eastern Europe, all floating in the same direction, that of a permanent league of nations to enforce and maintain the peace of the world.

How can the churches better help to bring about that petition which we constantly pray for "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," than by keeping this great object constantly before the public.

OPPORTUNITY.

We feel so strongly that the study and practice of social service is really applied Christianity that we publish the following announcement in full, even at the risk of repeating something that may have appeared in these columns within the past few weeks:

To assist in filling the unprecedented demand for workers in the field of social service and in the various lines of community work which the war has given rise to, we wish again to call attention to the course of training which the School of Social Work and Public Health in Richmond will offer, beginning October 1st. The war has created several new types of social work whose development bears a close, even if indirect relationship, to the successful conduct of the war. Industrial welfare work is an illustration. Before the war a number of cotton mills and factories through the South employed welfare workers to develop community work in the mill villages. Now, however, in the hundreds of munition plants in all parts of the country where girls and young women are employed, living under entirely new conditions, and where the speed of the work is so great, women trained in promoting the welfare and health of the employees have become not a luxury, but an absolute necessity.

The war has greatly increased the proportion of juvenile delinquency. From the juvenile courts in the South consequently there arises an increased demand for probation officers; but these cannot be found. The supply was much less than the demand before the war. Now it has become an absolute necessity for new people to enter this field of activity.

We earnestly hope that enough women without home ties will be able to avail themselves of this course in order to help meet the present shortage of workers in this field of work. The development of the profession is now being held back because of the shortage of workers.

Not only have the newer types of social work which the war has developed been embarrassed by lack of sufficient workers, but the older social agencies have been even more embarrassed by the increase in the amount of their work and, also, by the leaving of such large numbers of members of their staffs to enter the service of the various kinds of war-time social agencies described above. A good proportion of the men formerly holding executive positions in social work are now in the army. Many have gone into the Red Cross work abroad. The positions which they formerly held have got to be filled by women. It is now a real problem to get enough people to fill the positions. There is a steady and persistent call for workers in charity organization, in settlements, for positions with girls' and boys' club work, in medical and health social service, in travelers' aid work and various kinds of institutional positions.

The School of Social Work and Public Health, where this course of training is to be given, is unique in that it is the only school of this kind in the whole South. During its first year, which ended in June, emphasis was laid on the training of public health nurses and home service workers, who, after taking the course of training in Richmond, could return to their home communities to deal with the social problems which the war has produced there. Thirty-five or forty women have completed this course already. What the need is now, however, is for paid workers who can go wherever they are sent and give their full time on salary.

Social work offers very many advantages that should appeal to the Christian women of the South. While it requires the missionary spirit and while a belief and fervent exposition of the teachings of Christ are necessary, this spirit of service will not be exploited. The workers will be paid adequate salaries—somewhat better than in teaching. One former teacher who took the course last year is now receiving almost twice as much as she received in teaching. We are assured that graduates of the course can obtain positions immediately afterwards at salaries from $75 to $100 per month to begin with.

Further information about the course can be obtained by writing Dr. H. H. Hibbs, Jr., School of Social Work and Public Health, 1112 Capito! Street, Richmond, Va.

LET PEACE END IT.

The National Defense League is busily securing signatures to a pledge binding the signer not to buy anything made in Germany so long as he or she shall live.

We consider such a pledge to be utterly un-Christian, and think the churches should exert all of their influence in opposition to such a move.

Our readers know that we have advocated the most vigorous prosecution of the war, that we believe it should not cease until the present German view that might makes right is completely vanquished, but the very completeness of such a peace should make it unnecessary to drag war engendered hatred into numberless years after the struggle is over. We should fight to a victorious finish that will not require an economic struggle after peace is made.

The one spiritual need of the soldiers is Christianity, and it must be brought to them by men who believe in it and are shaped by it. The American churches must send their best Christians to France. They must send them as chaplains, as officers and as private soldiers. Christian huts are good, but Christian men are better. They are among their fellows in trench and billet, and their lives and teaching speak amid the burstings of shells and the cries of wounded. The first need of soldiers at the front is therefore for Christianity in the flesh, the gospel incarnate. Give us men!—Chaplain Tiplady.

Fourteenth Sunday After Trinity:

At this point it may be well to restate the idea of the New Lectionary for the morning course in the second half of the second year. The first lessons are intended to cover the history and literature of the Jews after their return and re-establishment in the Promised Land up to the Coming of the Christ, the second lessons being correlated with the first. Thus, beginning with the public reading of the "Book of the Law of Moses" on Whitsunday (Nehemiah 8), we have given, both on Sundays and on week days, that law which whether written then or completed then or remembered then was, at any rate, then for the first time taken seriously and made regulative of the national life. What we know as Judaism and what our Lord encountered when He came in the flesh, then for the first time began to be. Two things are intended to be accomplished for us Churchmen by these readings: one is the understanding of Judaism, which is the background of the Life of our Lord; and the other is a further and more spiritual preparation for another Advent season. "The law was a school master to bring us to Christ." Of course, also, there is much of type of the spiritual realities of the kingdom of God, here and hereafter, in these readings, which the second lessons are designed to help bring out. The first lesson for this Sunday morning finishes the course in Deuteronomy, and is the prophetic blessing of the Tribes. The second lesson gives St. Paul's explicit reference to the tribes as relying upon the promises of God; and the story of his conversion not only shows how those promises are to be understood, but also is in line with the teaching of the Collect on "faith, hope and love." Both lessons, also, as was the case last Sunday, are keyed to the basic idea of both Collects, the promises of God. The evening lessons, both on love, are obviously related to the Collect, in which we pray for the increase of faith, hope and love, and that we may love what God commands.

For the week day lessons there is an obvious appropriateness in Romans, with its discussion both of the spiritual meaning of the law and its philosophy of history as turning on the relative positions of Jew and Gentile. The proper assignment of the prophet Joel, used by us this week, is a difficult matter, from the strictly critical standpoint; but it is full of promises of the Coming of the Lord and of His Spirit and may well be used here, along with other evangelical prophecies, supplementary to the law as preparation for the Advent. On Saturday, it will be noted, we have given Isaiah 56, followed by other Isaiah passages on next Sunday and following days. It is well known that the authorship and time of composition of chapters 40 to the end of the Book of Isaiah is a storm centre of Biblical Criticism. It does not admit of dispute, however, that, like the fully developed law, no matter when written or by whom, the application belongs to the experience of God's people during and after the Return. We have therefore used Isaiah 40-55 in connection with the Return (Easter-tide) and Isaiah 56 ff at certain stages during the rest of the year. The various passages will be found to lead up to the Coming of Our Lord.

Children in Church.

Children attending the church services is a condition much to be desired, and a great deal is written on the subject, and many expedients have been adopted in efforts to bring it about. Special hymns, special sermonettes and other schemes have been tried to induce the children to go from the Sabbath school into the preaching service instead of going home. These schemes may work very well for a little while, but the novelty soon wears out, and the attendance soon drops off. We believe the whole principle is wrong. What would be thought of the public school authorities if they spent their efforts in trying to make the school exercises so attractive that the children would easily be persuaded to come to school? Would it not be considered far more appropriate for them, if need be, to persuade the parents that the children ought to go to school. If the fathers

Parents owe this duty to their children in fulfillment of the baptismal vow to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.—Ex.

Seeking.

Is it not true that those who seek shall find?

Perchance ye lift your weary looks too high;

For if the Father loves you, and is kind,

He must be always nigh.

These vesper clouds are tinged with amethyst,

And clear and calm the stars of evening shine;

But lo! He walks beside us in the mist,

And takes your hand and mine.

We sought Him long in those far-distant skies,

And then came back to earth in doubt and fear;

The children met us with their trustful eyes,

And said, "Our Lord is here."

For ever here, and not in cloud or star,

Close to our hearts, in all our nights and days;

So loving that He cannot dwell afar From our poor earthly ways.

O ye, who watch and wait for angel wings,

Behold Him walking on the trampled sod,

Busy with humble lives and common things;

Our Father and our God.

A widow, whose only son was fighting in France, had not received a letter from him for a long time. To her delight, one morning a letter came. It was of bulky dimensions, but to her surprise, on opening it, every single word had been erased by the censor. The only thing readable was a footnote by the censor himself: "Madam, your son is quite well, but he talks too much."

The Awakening.

By Theodosia Garrison.

When the white dawn comes
I shall kneel to welcome it;
The dread that darkened on my eyes
Shall vanish and be gone.
I shall look upon it
As the parched on fountains,
Yet it was the blinding night
That taught the joy of dawn.

When the first bird sings
Oh, I shall hear rejoicing,
And all my life shall thrill to it
And all my heart draw near.

I shall lean to listen,
Lest a note elude me,
Yet it was the fearsome night
That taught me how to hear.

When the sun comes up
I shall lift my arms to it;
The fear of fear shall fall from me
As shackles from a slave.
I shall run to hail it,
Free and unbewildered,
Yet it was the silent night
That taught me to be brave.

Kitty's Guest Room.

Kitty Bray had a little dream that she was trying to make come true. The name of it was "My Guest Room," and it remained in her thoughts from morning until night.

Although Kitty was only sixteen, she kept house for her uncle, who was her adopted father, and for his four sons. She knew how to carry the heavy responsibilities of her lot, and day in, day out, she cooked and cleaned and polished and patched, as busy as any bee in a golden hive.

But Kitty's hive was not golden, and just here was where the drop of bitter mixed with her honey's sweet. Uncle William and the boys were thrifty, industrious farmers; they provided well for the table and saw to it that Kitty did not lack for the necessities of life—but more than that they did not bother themselves to provide. Furniture made for comfort as well as for use, ornaments, knickknacks—the little nameless, inexpensive luxuries that help to make a home—were well within their means, but entirely out of their calculations.

They were off to work by sunrise and back at sunset for a drowsy supper and a quick "turning in"; they were quite content that the farmhouse furnishings should consist of nothing except beds, chairs and a table. If Kitty pinned a bright picture on the wall or hung pretty curtains here and there, her efforts went entirely unnoticed. To be sure, she kept on pinning and hanging for her own sake; but sometimes her little efforts had a discouraging way of bringing out the ugly bareness of the house instead of covering it up; and often the small, beauty-loving girl sighed from the very depths of her calico-covered heart.

"What do you want of a sofa, Kit?" Uncle William would inquire gruffly when she found courage to put in a plea, as she did now and then. "And what's the good of spindle-legged tables, and why clutter the house with trash? We're plain folks; let's live plainly. If you want a new dress, why, get it; but let the old rooms stay the way they've stayed since my father was born. You've too many notions in your head."

The boys, too, scoffed—more or less kindly—at her little ambitions.

"Anyone that can make biscuits like yours, Kit, needn't be bothering about fandangles," big Jerry said, laughing. "And I'd rather eat your apple dumpings than sleep on a carved gold bed under silk quilts!"

"I don't want any carved gold beds." Kitty answered, blinking to hold back her tears. "I just want a house that doesn't look like a barn."

Buck was not so good-humored as Jerry, and through his nature ran a little streak of stinginess. "The rest of us are thankful for a roof," he said to her rather sharply. "Why can't you stop grumbling, Kitty Bray?"

That was unjust, for Kitty never grumbled; it was only her passionate desire to have some pretty things round her that stirred her once in a while to gentle rebellion. The other two boys, Nat and Thomas, laughed at her, too. Thomas was somewhat scornful, like Buck; Nat's derision was chiefly mischievous. "Whoever goes to town this afternoon," he would say, "mustn't forget to order a Brussels carpet and a buffet. Kitty wants to rig the rooms, you know."

But as they well knew, Kitty wanted nothing fine or expensive; what she wanted they could easily afford. However, as the months went by it became plainer and plainer that the big old house was to remain just as forlorn as it had been through the generation behind it. And at last her longing took the form of one special desire: she wanted, she would have, a guest chamber! Since her uncle and cousins were content with bare floors and stark walls, she would try to be, too; but at least one single spot in the house should be cosy and fair—a spare room, a guest chamber set apart.

It did not daunt her to remember that guests at the Bray farm were as rare as robins in January. At long intervals they did drop in; sometimes a wayfarer, asking shelter for the night; sometimes a cattle dealer, stopping over on business; or the country doctor, storm bound in winter. Once a boyhood friend of Uncle William's had come unexpectedly, and had had to sleep in Nat's ramshackle single bed in a dingy room over the hall. Again, Mrs. Herndon, the pretty little lady from the adjoining farm, had been caught overnight in a fierce thunderstorm, and all Kitty's pleasure in preparing the dainty supper had been shadowed by the thought of the shabby little room in which her guest would have to pass the night. But most she minded about the minister—a gentle old man who came down four times a year for services at Hebron church, and who always stayed at the Bray farm. He seemed older and feebler each time he came, and over and over again Kitty caught herself thinking of the Shunammite woman in the Bible and her "prophet's chamber" kept ready for the weary pilgrim.

"Just one single room," she said to herself again, one day in October, as she churned busily, "to look pretty and sweet and resty!"

That very night an idea popped into her drowsy brain and set her to tossing wakefully until dawn. With the first glimmer of day she rose and crept up the dusty stairs that led to the dustier attic.

At the top she stood still and looked about her for a long time. The attic, which occupied the whole third floor of the big old house, was divided into two large rooms. The roof was high, and there were several small windows that let a current of air through and kept the whole place cool in the warmest weather. The room at the head of the stairway was full of rubbish and broken furniture, among which were two dilapidated maple beds. The room beyond was empty, and in the doorway of that room Kitty stood dreaming for a quarter of an hour. "Maybe I could," she said aloud at last; then presently she added, "Of course I can!"

All through the fall and the winter she was busier, if possible, than ever. To be cook and housemaid for a family of five, and at the same time to engineer a big undertaking of your own, is no light matter, but Kitty seemed to thrive on it. She grew rosier and sang a good deal; queer little errands kept her flying here and there about the house; she was never idle a minute.

"What do you call yourself up to?" Jerry demanded one sunny day in November. "You're acting like a mud-dauber. Ten times in the last hour you've buzzed into the house, with wings set for dear life."

It was just like Jerry to get a faint inkling of her secret; it was also just like him to set about helping her in his own clumsy way. When he found her in the old woodshed trying to knock together a little table from a few rough boards, he took the hammer from her hands.

"Here, that's a job for a real carpenter," he said, and set to work.

A heavy rain came opportunely the next day, and Jerry not only made a table, but also put together a small washtand and a chest of drawers. They were rough and plain, but Kitty's eyes shone joyfully when he presented them to her with a bow.

"Put 'em in the rubbish room," she whispered, and followed him upstairs to see that he went no farther.

Spring came, and still Kitty Bray bustled and flitted. Anyone except a set of unobservant men would have wondered why she scurried upstairs and down so often, and why she laughed so much as she did her work; but only Jerry had noticed anything at all, and he had forgotten as soon as the first ploughing day dawned.

The third week of May was very warm. The sun beat down as fiercely as in midsummer, and man and beast suffered with the unaccustomed heat. Kitty put green leaves in the laborers' hats when they went out to work, and twice a day carried cooling drinks to the field. She was making iced lemonade one stiffling hot noon, when a hurried thump of feet made her look up. A group of men were mounting the steps to the porch.

"Buck's got a sunstroke," Jerry explained briefly, pushing past the others, who were carrying an inert form. "And dad's nearly laid out, too. But here's Doc Saunders—he happened along in the nick of time, and everything's going to be all right. Where shall we carry Buck?"

Kitty glanced swiftly at Buck's flushed face and her uncle's bowed shoulders before she could gather her scattered wits. The doctor looked at her uncertainly. Through an open door the room that Buck and his father shared could be plainly seen—neat, but glaringly uncomfortable.

"They both ought to have some cool, quiet place," Doctor Saunders said, glancing about with evident dissatisfaction.

"This way," Kitty commanded suddenly.

She beckoned to the men, and they followed her without a word. The two farm hands carried Buck; Uncle William stumbled along between Nat and Tom; Jerry and the doctor brought up the rear. It would have been ludicrous at any other time to see the seven big men filing in solemn confidence behind their slim little guide—through the hall and up one flight of steps, down the upper hall, and slowly up a second flight.

Through the first attic room they tramped, and Kitty flung wide the door to the second room. It was a room in truth, now; in spite of her anxiety, she gave a short skip of joy on the threshold. Through wide-open windows north and south a little breeze blew; a tall green tree, standing like a giant sentinel, sheltered the west window. On the floor was spread a broad "rag" rug of restful blue, woven through many a long winter evening; simple pictures in pine-cone frames hung on the newly whitewashed walls. Jerry's chest of drawers, surmounted by a bright little mirror, was dressed in starched white muslin; so, too, was the washstand, which bore a shallow bowl and pitcher, no less useful for having been artfully mended with some mysterious concoction. An ancient clock, made to go again by means of much coaxing and a little oil, ticked softly on the small shelf that served as mantel. A vase of creamy roses, delicate and fragrant, shared the tiny table with a book or two. Downstairs the air had seemed lifeless, but up here at the top of the house the breeze steadily fluttered the white muslin curtains and stirred the roses; a cool, green light filtered through the leaves.

There were two shining maple beds, a little wobbly, but rubbed bright and hung with snowy coverings. On one of the beds the men laid Buck, and on the other Uncle William sank with a grateful sigh. The men tiptoed out, and Doctor Saunders, with Kitty for assistant, fell to work on Buck.

"It's not nearly as bad as it might be," the doctor said, as he took a bowl of ice from a ready hand at his elbow. He looked approvingly about the room. "He'll pull through all right up here."

Uncle William raised his eyes. "Where did you get this room from, Kit?" he asked; his voice was gentler than usual. "Where in the name of sense did you get it from?"

His niece laughed joyously. "Oh, it's a rather long story," she replied.

"Looks like witchcraft to me," Uncle William continued. "All the way in from the field I was sort of dreading that hot, noisy room downstairs. You see, when a man's head aches this way—" His voice trailed off into silence; he was nearly asleep.

A little after sunset Buck opened his eyes. The room was quiet in the cool twilight; rose petals had fallen on the floor. "Come here, Kit," he said after a moment. "Where am I?"

"Why, Buck Bray!" laughed his cousin. "In the house where you were born and raised—where else?"

"Shucks?" said Buck in derisive unbelief, and lay down again with a contented sigh. "Well, wherever 'tis, you've got me feeling mighty easy, sis. I guess I'll nap again now."

Jerry and Tom had come up to see how the patients were getting on.

"Tom, here," said Jerry, "doesn't understand about this attic. He vows you didn't do it."

"This is my guest chamber," Kitty answered proudly. "Uncle William and Buck are my first guests; the minister will be the next."

"Well, it's a room!" Tom declared, looking about him with open admiration. "Where'd you get the money?"

"It cost just four dozen eggs from my two Leghorns," Kitty said. "And that's all. It wasn't a very extravagant undertaking."

Uncle William spoke unexpectedly from his corner. "How many eggs would it take," he asked, "to do my room? If the hens don't lay enough to pay for it," he added, chuckling—so cool he was and so content—"why, I reckon I can afford to make up the rest!"—Selected.

For the Southern Churchman. In Time of War.

(To be sung to the tune, Pilgrims.)

Anna Chandler Ayer.

God, give us courage in this day of trial,
Courage to bear what comes of grief or pain,

Strength for the sacrifice, the self-denial
Which we must know ere peace shall come again.

O God of justice, O God of might,
Help us to conquer in our struggle for the right.

Increase our faith, for it may be tomorrow
Brother or son must perish by the sword;

Grant us to see that, even though we sorrow,
They live forever with our risen Lord.

O God of justice, O God of might,
Help us to conquer in our struggle for the right.

Father, we beg no gift of Thee, no geurdon,

Only for strength and fortitude we ask.
We would be strong to share our country's burden,

We would not shrink from any daily task.

O God of justice, O God of might,
Help us to conquer in our struggle for the right.

O make us steadfast in our high endeavor,
Let us complete the work we have begun;

Let us not turn aside nor falter ever
Till truth has triumphed and the goal is won.

O God of justice, O God of might,
Help us to conquer in our struggle for the right!

For the Southern Churchman. Sugar Sharing.

Under the above significant caption the Food Administration sets forth very convincingly this week the whys and wherefores of the recent sugar restrictions. Those of us who are inclined to chafe a little under the new rulings will probably feel much more reconciled after we have weighed well the facts in hand.

The whole matter lies in a nutshell. There is a shortage of sugar here and in Europe. We cannot in honor compel our allies to do with less while we take more ourselves. The only way to meet the situation is to impose restrictions on the use of sugar, and this the government is doing by means of rulings for merchants, manufacturers and householders. The success of the program rests on the honor and the co-operation of the American people.

What we are trying to do is to equalize more nearly the supplies of all who sit at a common table, pledged to a common defense. While we Americans are submitting to two pounds of sugar a month per person the English are having no more, the French are managing with one and a half pounds apiece and the Italians with one pound. Then, there is the Army and the Navy, which must have their ration—no small consideration!

Several causes contribute to the sugar shortage. The burden of maintaining Allied supplies falls on the shoulders of the United States. England can no longer, of course, import from the Central Powers, and can obtain much less sugar than usual from Java; the Germans have destroyed the beet-sugar fields and the sugar factories of France and Italy. Labor shortage here at home interferes seriously with the output, and—even more important—ships cannot be spared to bring sugar in from old sources. Many ships that would have kept up the flow of sugar into this country have been destroyed. Others have been diverted to uses that could not be ignored: forty thousand tons of sugar-carrying shipping, for example, were transferred to meet the requirements of the Belgian relief. Submarine sinkings have cost us great stores; twenty-six thousand tons were sent to the bottom of the sea recently on our Atlantic coast. You see, the Food Administration makes out a pretty strong case!

Provision for canning has been seen to, of course, for canning is important economy. By means of sterilization and by careful exclusion of air, however, a good deal of fruit may be canned without any sugar at all. Fruit pulp and juices can be sterilized and bottled without sweetening, then later, when sugar is less scarce, made into jams, jellies and preserves. Corn syrups and other table syrups that are not made with granulated sugar can be used with sugar, and in some parts of the country canned syrups and sorghums are available that can be used without any sugar at all. Another way of saving fruits and sugar at the same time is to dry the fruits; another, to store them in a cool cellar. Still a third method is to evaporate fruit pulp to a paste and this concentrates the natural fruit sugar.

Neither cane nor beet sugar is absolutely necessary in the human diet. In the average American menu all the bodily needs may ordinarily be supplied by honey, syrups and fresh, preserved and dried fruits. Be sparing of confections and sweet cakes: last year the people of the United States spent money enough in candy alone to feed all starving Belgium for two years. Supplement sugar with honey, maple syrup and corn syrup, and cultivate a taste for fruit in its natural sweetness. If a recipe calls for one cupful of sugar, use instead an equal quantity of strained honey or a little less than twice as much corn syrup—not forgetting, at the same time, that the amount of liquid called for in the recipe must be reduced one-fourth of a cupful for every cupful of substitute sweetening. Make potatoes furnish some of the energy-food formerly yielded by sugar.

After all, the burden laid on the individual is not excessive. True, before the war we averaged six and two-thirds pounds of sugar apiece per month, but we shall each of us find, with practice, that it is entirely possible to do without the four and two-thirds pounds that we are asked to forego. It is a good deal a matter of self-discipline, and who can use self-discipline in time of war? A little care here, a little thought there—above all, a systematic training of the palate—and the thing is done.

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

XI. Ashamed of Jesus.

An extraordinary interest attaches to this hymn—a hymn that has been sung in church and household for nearly a hundred and fifty years—for it is the work of a boy of ten. Joseph Gregg was the author's name, and of himself and his simple history little is now known; perhaps little ever was. What we do know is that he was a thoughtful, religious youth of England, who worked as a mechanic during the early part of his life and later became a Presbyterian minister. He preached for a time in the Presbyterian chapel, Silver street, London. The version in the Episcopal hymnal is not so long as the original hymn; and not a few changes have been made in the text. But the main form and spirit of the poem have been conscientiously preserved, and the composition stands as a most remarkable achievement for a child only ten years old.

Jesus, and shall it ever be,
A mortal man ashamed of Thee?
Ashamed of Thee, Whom angels praise,
Whose glories shine through endless days?

Ashamed of Jesus' sooner far
Let night disown each radiant star;
'Tis midnight with my soul till He,
Bright Morning Star, bid darkness flee.

Ashamed of Jesus! oh, as soon
Let morning blush to own the sun!
He sheds the beams of light divine
On this benighted soul of mine.

Ashamed of Jesus! that dear friend
On Whom my hopes of heaven depend!
No; when I blush be this my shame
That I no more revere His Name.

Ashamed of Jesus! empty pride!
I'll boast a Saviour crucified;
And, oh, may this my portion be,
My Saviour not ashamed of me.

The Soldier's Chances.

People with a passion for statistics will find interest, and perhaps no little comfort, in the following calculations, based on the mortality figures of the allied armies. According to these figures, a man has forty-nine chances of recovering from wounds to one chance of dying from them. He runs only one chance in five hundred of losing a limb. He has twenty-nine chances of coming home to one chance of being killed.

It sets us to thinking. This is straight, practical arithmetic, worked out from facts. Well, if cold mathematics can make out so good a case for the soldier boy's future, what may not those figures, aided and abetted by the love, the hope, the strong prevailing prayers of those at home do for him—not to speak of his own faith? They are facts, too—the love and hope and faith and prayers—surer than anything in division or proportion. Summing things up carefully, the soldier's "chances" seems pretty good, after all!

The Happiness Road.

It's only just a little road,
The road that leads
To happiness. It's made of faith
And kindly deeds;

Of pleasantness, of words that bless,
Of thoughts that heal;
Of very silent giving up
For others' weal.

The road that leads to happiness
Is easy taking;
Beside it grass springs fresh and green,
And buds are breaking.

Oh, there are folks from far away,
And folks we know there.
So let us two take hands some day,
And, oh, let's go there!

Marbles and Manners.

"I'm never going to own anything in partnership with Harvey again!" Jack's face was red, and his voice had an edge on it.

He had spoken to his older brother, Hugh, who was reading by the table, but suddenly a head bobbed over the window sill and another voice, also with an edge, answered him unexpectedly, "Why?" demanded Harvey.

Jack looked a little taken back. "Because you're too careless," he said. "There's that blue marble, now—"

Harvey laughed, though his face was red. "And there's that green marble," he echoed, "that you lost, and the brown, and the purple."

Jack's eyes flashed. "I haven't finished naming the ones you lost yet," he rejoined. "The striped, you remember, and the white, and maybe more."

Here Hugh yawned and put down his book. "You two seem to have lost lots more than marbles, I should say," he remarked. "Seems to me you've lost a good deal of your manners."

But the smaller boys did not reply. They were getting more and more exasperated with each other. Both faces were flushed and they were talking very loudly.

"So it's this way," Hugh put in again. "Jack lost the green marble and the brown and the purple, and Harvey lost the white and the striped and the blue. That puts you even, anyway."

Harvey turned his back on Jack. "All right, then, we just won't own anything together, any more. I guess I'll be as well off as you!"

"Not quite," Jack retorted. "You lost the three prettiest marbles, remember. I always did specially like that blue."

"Just as I always specially liked the green," said Harvey, bound to have the last word.

"Boys," mother called from the sitting-room, "won't one of you run upstairs and bring me my thimble?"

The two little brothers made a bolt for the stairs; they always liked to wait on mother. They reached her room at the same time, and two brown hands plunged together into her work-basket. The contents of the basket were soon topsy-turvy.

"Here it is!" exclaimed Jack, in triumph. Then a queer look came into his face. For there, nestling against the thimble were three marbles, a green, a brown and a purple.

They hurried downstairs. "O, yes," said mother. "I intended to tell you about those marbles. The other day, while I was mending a certain coat pocket, I found them in the lining. They had slipped through the hole in the pocket."

Harvey looked up quickly. "Jack's coat," he said.

"No, yours," mother answered. "I'm just about to mend Jack's now."

Hugh turned away to hide a smile. Harvey looked sheepish; he tried to muster up the courage to glance at Jack, and when he did Jack was looking sheepish, too. Mother was reaching for his coat, but Jack stood still, turning redder and redder, and fumbling with the edge.

"I believe—" he said, "that is, I am almost sure—that marbles spilled into this lining, too. Slowly he pulled off the coat and shook it. Two marbles fell out—a striped and a white. "Well!" was all he could say. Both little boys looked ashamed.

"As for the beautiful blue marble," said Hugh, "that never was really lost to begin with. I've just remembered. When Jack traded bureaus with me he left it in the drawer, and it's been there ever since."

Mother smiled at the two abashed little brothers, but her eyes looked grieved. "Well, boys," she said, "now you have all six."

"But we feel pretty foolish," owned Jack. "I do, especially."

"I do, too," Harvey agreed. "Maybe manners would have been more important than marbles, anyway."

Mother said she thought so—and after that they generally were.

Who Told the Story?

"Mother, tell us about when you were a little girl." The children were sitting before the fire at the end of the day—just the time for story-telling.

"What shall I tell you? You have heard about it all," said their mother.

"Tell about the Indian, old War-warkumiss," Dorothy cried.

"That wasn't his name," broke in Arthur. "It was old Up-along Seekee."

"Yes, yes; let's have that one. Tell about the time that you were left to keep house and the big rain came."

"No, it wasn't rain," Arthur said; "it was when the blizzard came. It was when grandpa had to drive off over the hill to a sick patient."

"And, mother, you know when you were scared, and the nurse went away and left you before grandpa got back."

Arthur was out of breath and so Dorothy took up the story. "Yes, that is the one! And, mother, you were sewing on your sampler by the fire and you looked out and the snow was blowing round the mountain—"

ZZ-ee—ZZ-ee—Arthur imitated.

"Don't bother, Arthur; let mother tell it. She can make the ZZ-ee—ZZ-ee better than you can. But, mother, don't you remember how scared you were when you saw an Indian coming along down the mountain? You wanted to hide."

"But she didn't hide. Mother wasn't a coward. She said she guessed she wasn't going to let a big Indian freeze right out there in the snow, and she thought maybe he would not be ugly if she gave him some bread."

"Mother, it wasn't bread. Arthur always says bread. It was cake—you always tell it cake. He rapped on the door and you whispered softly, 'Don't you want some cake?' And he said, 'We want flour. Squaw some sick.'"

"And then you opened the door and he came in and warmed himself and you trembled and trembled until he said, 'Good Indian like little girl heap much.'"

"Yes, you can tell a story, you can!" Arthur's tone was full of scorn. "You forgot the basket. He had a big round basket and he had a big bag and he said, 'Twice full flour. Give basket.' Mother let him go to the barrel and dip out the flour and fill the basket and pour it into his long canvas bag."

"Yes, twice. You forgot the twice. And then he gave her the basket and went off up the mountain in all the snow and went 'way out of sight."

"And it's mother's darning basket now!" cried both children together.

There was silence before the fire. At last Arthur said, "No one can tell such good stories as mother."

"Yes, she makes you just see them!" said Dorothy.

"And I like to tell them," said their mother, as she laughed softly.—Edna A. Foster.

The Dog That Saved a Soldier.

Attached to a French command was a dog named Michael, larger, stronger, more intelligent than the others and of a gentle nature that made him a general favorite. Michael, although most "sociable," centered his affections upon a young French soldier named Henri. Every day at the soup hour Michael would appear carrying a tin can and place it beside Henri, who would fill it as he did his own, and they would dine together.

The day came, however, when Henri failed to return, and as the men stumbled back again to safety Michael scanned with anxious eyes each pale, haggard face, his sensitive nostrils quivering with dread.

When the last man had been accounted for and Henri was still missing, the animal darted toward the battlefield, and after some time returned, greatly excited and carrying an old half glove which belonged to his friend. He could scarcely wait for the attendants to bring a litter before he started off again, his great intelligent eyes imploring them to hurry.

In a remote part of the field they found the young fellow lying still and cold. After a hasty examination the attendants left him for dead, hurrying away to succor the living, but Michael refused to be convinced. Being left alone, he mounted his solitary guard, his face almost humanly expressive of grief.

The attack took place about sundown and it was not until late that night that comparative quiet had settled down upon the trenches.

Suddenly the moon flashed from behind a cloud, and the alert sentinel peered sharply about, then brought his rifle swiftly to his shoulder.

Not twenty feet away, creeping slowly toward the trenches, but halting abruptly every minute, loomed a large dark object. The sentry advanced cautiously, finger on trigger, demanding curtly, "Who goes there?" followed by the stifled exclamation, "Michael!"

Michael it was, gasping, panting, but still the same old dog Michael—but not alone. Behind him, parts of his uniform literally torn away by the dog's teeth, lay Henri, dragged from the battlefield, inch by inch, by the devoted animal. And miracle of miracles, the boy was actually breathing.

How the animal had accomplished such a Herculean task, and escaped the vigilant eyes of the attendants, will ever remain a mystery, but suffice it to say that little, fragil-looking Henri ultimately recovered, to challenge death once more at the front.—Our Dumb Animals.

For the Southern Churchman. The Sentry.

Anne Lloyd Basinger, Aged 10.

On the decks of the dreadnaught "Georgia"

The sentry's watch is on;
Back and forth, back and forth he paces
Awaiting the coming dawn.

His watch is like that of a nation—
They both watch for you and for me,
And we must give all to defend those
Who are giving their all to be free.

We will be free from this warfare,
The dawn will come at last;
With love we will work together,
And the watch will soon be past.

Ruth's Rainy-Day Box.

Ruth waked that morning with a feeling that something lovely was happening, and it was. The raindrops were pattering on the window, playing tag and leapfrog as they scurried down to say, "How do you do?" to the sleepy flowers.

Ruth dressed like a whirlwind and ran down to remind her mother that it was raining—and, best of all, it was Saturday!

"So may I telephone Louise to come over and spend the day, mother?" she asked eagerly. "And may we have luncheon in the play-room and open the rainy-day box?"

"Yes—three yes-es," said her mother, laughing. "But first let's calm down enough to enjoy a good breakfast."

A few blocks away Louise was so delighted with the weather and the day of the week that if any one had asked her what she ate for breakfast she would probably have replied, "Spring rain—and tea at Ruth's."

It was great fun to run along with the raindrops pelting her umbrella and blowing in slyly underneath. Rosy and laughing, she reached Ruth's home and slipped from her dripping raincoat like a gay butterfly from a snug cocoon.

"Mother thought of the rainy-day box first," Ruth told her guest, as she led the way to the big play-room, which was cozy with rag rugs and nursery pictures on the walls. "Uncle John is a carpenter, you know, and he built my beautiful box for me, just here under the windows."

Louise exclaimed over the new window seat, which was piled with pretty cushions, making a real cozy corner, where one could enjoy a story-book or look down into the great maples and watch the birds building their nests.

"Now we'll pile the cushions into this chair and open the box!" cried Ruth, merrily. "It's a heavy lid, but together—there! See my rainy-day things?"

With little giggles and cries of delight the girls bent over the treasure box, and with quick fingers brought out anything they chose. In one corner were old magazines, picture books, blunt scissors and tubes of paste. There were many paper dolls, a set of flowered dishes—even tiny glasses with a water pitcher—and a little blue Japanese luncheon cloth and napkins. In another corner were folded two quaint old gowns and some old-fashioned bonnets, which were grandma's contribution to Ruth's new box.

"First," explained Ruth, "we'll cut out pictures and paste them on these big sheets of cardboard that mother put in—if you want to—"

"Oh, yes!" agreed Louise, hastily. "And here are crayons to color with."

It was absorbing, delightful work to snip the pictures from magazines and then paste them as neatly as possible, leaving no sticky paste to show. Noon came along before the girls were ready for it, although they found themselves hungry enough when Mrs. Day appeared with a tray of goodies and told them to set the round tea table.

There was milk in the tiny glasses, and in a pitcher besides; there were sandwiches, fruit and such lovely little cookies shaped like birds' nests, only instead of eggs there was jelly in the middle.

After luncheon, which took a long time, with washing and putting away the dishes, the girls played with paper dolls. But the best game was to come; they had saved it for the last, just as they had saved the fattest cookie.

When the little clock struck three they put away their books and paper dolls, the scissors, the paste, and all the other things in the box. There was only an hour left, and they quickly "dressed up." Then, as Mrs. Morning Glory and Mrs. Wild Rose, they lived in opposite corners of the room, and called on each other, taking along large, well-behaved families of children.

Some of the Morning Glory and Wild Rose children were unbreakable, some merely of rags; the youngest were of celluloid or rubber.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Louise, as she made ready to go out into the wet, gray twilight. "Why are rainy days three times as short as others?"

Ruth eyed the little clock with a frown, as if she rather blamed it for giving wings to the hours.

"Well, there's one good thing," she said happily. "Grandma is a fine weather prophet, and she thinks it is going to be a wet spring."—The Youth's Companion.

For the Southern Churchman. Riddle.

Riddlemaree, flat and white,
I come by day and I come by night,
I have no wings and I have no feet,
But I travel far and I travel fleet.
I carry a head, but it's not my own,
And a round black mark on my coat is shown.
I bring folks joy and I bring them pain,
I bring them loss and I bring them gain.

In every country my form you see—
Who can read this riddlemaree?

Answer to last week's riddle: A watch.

See What You Can Do With This Soldier's Test.

The psychological test given candidates for officers' commissions in the Third Officers' Training Camp, although appearing simple, when one peruses the questions slowly and has ample time to answer, proved puzzling when an instantaneous answer was required.

While each question was being read, the candidates were compelled to poise their pencils in the air, so they could be seen by instructors, and then begin answering at the word "Go," and cease at the word "Stop."

For instance, a list of twenty sentences were given, in mixed up order, some of which were true and others false when straightened out. Here is one:

Morn the rises every sun true false
Animal a is the rare dog true false

The first question, when straightened into "The sun rises every morning," was true, and a line should have been drawn through "true."

Of the second, "The dog is a rare animal," the line, of course, should have been "false."

WHERE DRUGS FAIL.

Many chronic diseases fail to respond to drug treatment, even in the hands of the best physicians, whereas acute diseases usually respond readily. When a disease has become chronic, drugs often seem to do as much harm as they do good, for the system rebels against them. It is just this class of cases which derive the greatest benefit from Shivar Mineral Water. If you suffer with chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, sick headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney or liver disease, uric acid poisoning or other conditions due to impure blood, do not hesitate to accept Mr. Shivar's liberal offer as printed below. His records show that only two in a hundred on the average have reported "no beneficial results." This is a wonderful record from a truly wonderful spring. Simply sign the following letter:

The Saving of the Soul

The loss of the soul is not the loss of a spiritual faculty. It is spiritual death. It is the death of that spiritual nature which gives life its romance, lends to life's sorrows their significance, creates a new ideal of duty, and is quick with a sense of God. Surely the most urgent and imperative duty for a man is to save his soul. You have heard men sneer at the word of the evangelist. There is a false and un-Christ-like religion, whose one and only care is its personal safety, whose chief interest is its own spiritual culture. But that is not the saving of the soul in the teaching of Jesus. The saving of the soul is its renewal unto life, and its discipline unto godliness, and its exercise in the words and deeds of faith and charity. Surely that is the first duty of every man. It should be his duty to make his calling and election sure before he concerns himself with the saving of others.—W. M. Clow.

The Power Behind Strong, Keen, Red-Blooded Americans

"To help make strong, keen, red-blooded Americans there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. Nuxated Iron often increases the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, run-down people in two weeks' time. It is now being used by over three million people annually, including such men as Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, former Secretary of the Treasury, and ex-Governor of Iowa; former United States Senator Richard Rolland Kenney of Delaware, at present Major of the U. S. Army; General John L. Clemm (Retired), the drummer boy of Shiloh, who was sergeant in the U. S. Army when only 12 years of age; also United States Judge G. W. Atkinson of the Court of Claims of Washington and others. Nuxated Iron is dispensed by all good druggists everywhere.

SECURITY AND SERVICE

As Thy Days.

"God broke our years in hours and days

That hour by hour and day by day,
By going just a little way,
We might be able all along
To keep quite strong.

Should all the weight of life
Be laid upon our shoulders
And the future rife with care and struggle,

Meet us face to face,

In just one place,
We could not go—our faith would fail,
And so, God lays a little on us every day

And never, I believe, in all the way
Will trials press so deep
Or pathways lie so threatening and so steep

But we can go, for by God's power
We only bear the burdens of the hour."

"What is being taught by the war? The crisis has revealed many faults in our character of which we were partly aware: our lack of preparation for an emergency, our amateurishness in dealing with great problems, our unwillingness to think great things out; the culpable lightness with which we have taken our imperial responsibilities, our engrossment with material interests, our selfishness as classes and individuals, our extravagance and love of luxury and excessive indulgence in amusements; our inadequate support of foreign missions, the vagueness of our religion, and our dislike of spiritual effort."—The Bishop of London.

The Call for Humility.

We need to pray for forgiveness and to humble ourselves before God for much that is wrong in our national life. There has been far too much neglect and forgetfulness of God; far too much pride and boasting, and failure and refusal to acknowledge Him and to consult His will; far too great addiction to pleasure, sport and money-making, a great and growing luxury and materialism and carnalism. We need to offer the prayer of the prophet, "O Lord, be gracious to us."—Charles Brown.

"There is a season on the earth when the year is at the spring, and life comes down upon it out of heaven from God. There is a season when the seed which has been lying in the soil, with a possibility of death and rottenness, and a possibility of life and beauty, springs up as life strikes within its germ. There is also a season in the experience of the soul. That season is at hand when a man is discovered to himself by the power of the Holy Spirit, and a new craving for fellowship with God, and a new desire to walk with Christ in the strength of truth and purity, awaken within the soul. Then comes the hour when an appealing prayer, a decisive vow, a single look upward, may be the opening of the door through which Christ enters to be light and life forever."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The Threefold Gift.

Three great gifts God has given to every soul born into the world. In the homes of the poor or the rich it is the same, for earthly conditions do not affect this. It is a heavenly treasure. It is God's gift.

And into the world with each child He has sent a guardian for that gift. It is born as the child is born, to live if it may and ever guard the treasure, a heavenly guardian for a Divine gift. And it is important that the guardian should live; for if he die, the treasure will vanish forever. People have sometimes failed to care for the guardian, and, ere they know it, the treasure of their life was gone.

The treasure is faith and hope and love. God gives these to each individual soul.

Faith is a crystal jewel through which is seen a glorified world.

Hope is a crystal jewel through which is seen a glorious world.

Love is a crystal jewel in which is seen a happy world.

And these jewels bring heaven near, and realize it to us, and make it desirable to us as is the glorious old world God has given us first. O, how precious are these gifts! How we should try to keep them!

And the guardian of these treasures is religion. That, too, comes into every child's world, into every man's world with the man. Sometimes ignorance has distorted it into superstition, but it was first religion. It is the guardian of the jewels of life. No heart ever kept its jewels and lost its religion, and none ever kept a pure religion and lost its treasure.—J. H. Newland.

A famous doctor once said: "Encourage your child to be merry and to laugh aloud. A good, hearty laugh expands the chest and makes the blood bound merrily along. Commend me to a good laugh—not to a little, sniggling laugh, but to one that will sound through the house. It will not only do your child good, but it will be a benefit to all who hear and be an important means of driving the blues away from a dwelling. Merriment is catching and spreads in a remarkable manner, few being able to resist the contagion. A hearty laugh is a delightful harmony; indeed, it is the best of all music."—The Continent.

Love Makes Great.

How can one man, how can all men,
How can we be like St. Paul,
Like St. John, or like St. Peter,
Like the least of all
Blessed saints? for we are small.

Love can make us like St. Peter,
Love can make us like St. Paul,
Love can make us like the blessed
Bosom friend of all,
Great St. John, though we are small.

Love which clings, and loves, and worships,
Love which rises from a fall,
Love which, prompting glad obedience,
Labors most of all,
Love makes great, the great and small.

—Anon.

Prayer and Patriotism.

Are you praying for your nation?
We do not mean merely uttering a form of words upon occasion, with no spirit and life pulsating in them, but a genuine outpouring of the heart in real intercession before Almighty God. We know of no patriotism greater than that, of no other service more helpful.

Of course, it is not the only patriotic thing a man can do. It is not all he should do. It is not a substitute for other forms of patriotic service. Neither can other forms be substituted for it. And the man who prays the best and the most sincerely will also be the most diligent in meeting the demands and needs of his nation.

But to pray for one's country—provided it is a real and genuine outpouring of the heart—is the greatest act one may perform. It puts the nation into direct touch with the Almighty, without whose blessing and help no government can measure up to its highest possibilities and attain its greatest success.

A nation at prayer makes possible the discovery of His will for the nation, to know and to do which should be the chief concern of those who live beneath its protecting flag.

A nation at prayer will guarantee that the causes she espouses and for which she fights will be only those making for the welfare and prosperity of men. Her sword will be unsheathed only in wars of truth against error, of justice against injustice, of liberty against oppression, of light against darkness, of righteousness against unrighteousness.

A nation at prayer makes for its prosperity and exaltation. The fruit of prayer is righteousness; and long years ago it was written: "Righteousness exalteth a nation." The scroll of history declares this truth as emphatically as Scripture.

So the nation needs men to pray always and not only in times of stress and storm, of battle and conflict. It may not be true that God will not hear our cry in times of great crises if we ignore Him in times of peace and prosperity, though there is grave danger of that. We can only be sure to have Him on board our ship of State in times of storm if we have made Him welcome there in fair weather. We are sure to have Him in the days of darkness if we have cultivated His companionship in days of light.—Selected.

The Straight Gate.

God can do nothing great for a life that shrinks from supreme difficulty. The question for us is: Have we let the Spirit lead us into hard problems? Have we let Him urge us into tasks for which we ourselves have not the capacity, except as we rely on Divine wisdom and power? Have we crept out of the challenge of the Spirit on the plea of our modest estimate of our ability? If so, we must suffer the penalty of diminished personal development. No amount of devotional life can make up for a retreat from practical, actual, difficult tasks in life.—J. D. Adam.

The Great Agent.

It is only the gospel that can meet the world's need. Commerce and government, philanthropy and education, deal with that need superficially, and in the hands of shallow or evil men only accentuate it. A force is needed which will cut down to the roots, which deals with life in the name and by the power of God; which marches straight upon the soul and reconstructs character, which saves men one by one. Here we are flat upon the issue. It is our duty to carry Christianity to the world because the world needs to be saved, and Christ alone can save it. The world needs to be saved from want and disease and injustice and inequality and impurity and lust and hopelessness and fear, because individual men need to be saved from sin and death, and only Christ can save them. His is the only power which will forgive and regenerate, which will reach down deep enough to transform, and will hold till transformation is fixed.—R. E. Speer.

Prayer should be the Christian's most cherished privilege. The Word of God and the experience of God's people assure us that God Himself hears and answers prayer. It is not our place to criticize His answers; it is only our part to ask. God will give or withhold as seems best to Him. If it were otherwise, we would scarcely dare to pray at all. If answers to our prayers were always exactly in the form that we desired, we would soon learn that our human limitations make it impossible for us to know what it is best for us to have under all circumstances. But God, in His infinite wisdom, knows best. He answers according to His wisdom rather than according to our desires.—Christian Observer.

BEFORE YOU GO TO FRANCE LEARN FRENCH AND ABOUT FRANCE"The American Soldier in France"

A military guide-book for our troops going abroad, by Geo. N. Tricoche, late of the French army.

Read what the chief of staff says about it:

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCESOffice of the Chief of Staff

(Extracts from a letter dated General Headquarters, October 15, 1917.)

"... The six copies of 'The American Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing ... and the remainder will be distributed to staff officers. ...

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover. ... Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc." ...

THE CRISIS.

From the Council Address of the Bishop of Indianapolis.

At the first the war seemed to shake the faith of some in a loving and merciful God. Today men's hold on God seems to be stronger and more secure. While the stream of life ran smoothly; when our minds were filled chiefly with thoughts of our own pleasure and profit, our ease and tranquility; when laying up for ourselves was the chief aim of life; while we dwelt in a fancied security and boasted ourselves of our own sufficiency, God did not, perchance, fill a large place in our lives. Now, we cannot get along without God. We may still need yet further discipline and the purification of greater trials; but whether in victory or defeat, God and the life beyond the grave will be new or at least revived realities. "Somehow, God seems nearer here than He did at home," wrote one who was "doing her bit" in a hospital at the front, and she thus expressed what has been felt by many who before had known little and thought less of the presence of God with us and in us. We must try to look through the horrors of the battlefield and of the hospital to that which is beyond; we must strive to act worthily and bravely and faithfully and withal patiently until at last the victory shall be won—the victory for God and for humanity.

We speak of this time as a crisis in the world's history. And so it is; a crisis so grave that we dare not treat it lightly or indifferently. But what many of us fail to recognize is that there can be no world crisis which does not create a crisis in the life of the individual and of the Church. What manner of men are we? Have the conditions of our life made us effeminate, weak, stolid, indifferent, careless of what is going on about us so long as we are not personally affected, neutral in the battle that is being always fought between right and wrong? Or are we men, strong, determined, courageous, ready to fight against everything that is base, sensual, immoral, unjust, unworthy? The war is testing us. And so with the Church. The

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

world's crisis is the Church's crisis and its great opportunity. Through the smoke of the battle, towering above the dying and the dead on the battlefields, in the midst of the din of discordant voices disseminating enmity and hatred, stands the figure of the Christ—the incarnation of Love—the tender, pitying, grieving Saviour of the world, the victor over sin and death, who is able to save to the uttermost all who come to Him. The Church is Christ's ambassador, His agent, in and to the world, the only meeting ground for friend and foe, where once more the Brotherhood of Man may be realized and the unity of God's family be restored.

It behooves us then, men and brethren, to consecrate ourselves anew to Christ for service in His kingdom; to see to it that the Church is equipped and made ready to minister to a stricken world and to become, in His Name and by His power, the mediator between nations and peoples even as He is the mediator between God and man, and the restorer of the ideals and purposes which the world has lost even as He is the restorer of all things.

With the Whole Heart.

The first thing a man must do if he desires to be used in the Lord's work is to make an unconditional surrender of himself to God. He must consecrate and then concentrate. A man who does not put his whole life into one channel does not count for much, and the man who only goes into work with half a heart does not amount to much. We are living in an intense age, and if a man is to succeed he must set himself apart for the work and throw all his energy into it.—D. L. Moody.

The Things That Count: This war is teaching us how much of our life which we counted necessary is not necessary at all. It is worth something to come to the knowledge of real things. In our abundance life was becoming too complex. It took too much to satisfy us. Those who have been with the men in the trenches tell us that for the first time they have seen a naked soul, robbed of the conventionalities which we have vainly believed was life. Houses and lands and wealth and luxury—these are not necessary, real things. The real things are love and courage and faith and God and heaven. Happy for us if we cling to these, even if we must let the others go.—Methodist Protestant.

Have you never heard of a man, talking flippantly today of the world's system, of the government of life, of the secrets of existence? and tomorrow some blow, some surprise has come right into the midst of his knowledge and killed it. Things have gone entirely different from what he expected, from what he prophesied. He has found how ignorant he is, and has been driven to the deeper understanding of a will that works under everything, to that fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom. Knowledge, ignorance, wisdom—here are the strata of life again; the first birth into one, death through the second, and a new birth into the third.—S. D. Gordon.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Our heaviest burdens are those we have no business to pick up.

Wherever there is a human being there is an opportunity for kindness.

Desire to be good, above all things—a gift from God that is certain to be satisfied.

Put your faith where it will be safe; and the only place where a faith can ever be safe is in the shrine of an action.

If we are not responsible for the thoughts that pass our doors, we are at least responsible for those we admit and entertain.

There are few men so obstinate in their atheism that a pressing danger will not reduce them to an acknowledgment of the divine power.

It makes the mind very free when we give up wishing, and only think of bearing what is laid upon us, and doing what is given us to do.

Things which never could have made a man happy, develop a power to make him strong. Strength and not happiness, or rather only that happiness which comes by strength, is the end of human living.

It is impossible to walk across so much as a rood of the natural earth with mind unagitated and rightly poised, without receiving strength from stone, flower, leaf or sound, nor without a sense as of a dew falling on you out of the sky.—Johnson.

And yet when sails are furled, like wings at even,

And love lies dead upon the sands it trod,

The old desires shall light us into heav'n,

Old failures shine upon the face of God.

Please state in what paper you saw this.

Many mean things are done in the family for which moods are put forward as the excuse; when the moods themselves are the most inexcusable things of all. A man or woman in tolerable health has no moral right to indulge in an unpleasant mood.

There are two spirits in machinery—the spirit of weariness, weakness, or inventing ways of getting out of work; and there is the spirit in the machine, too, of moving mountains, conquering the sea and air, of working harder and lifting one's work to more heroic, to more splendid and difficult, and almost impossible things. The fate of our modern civilization is all hanging on the battle between the spirit of achievement, the spirit of creating things and the spirit of weariness, or the spirit of thinking of ways of getting out of things.—Gerald Stanley Lee.

Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees;

Who hopeless lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
Who hath not learned in hours of faith

The truth to flesh and sense unknown,

That Life is ever Lord of death,
And Love can never lose its own!

—Whittier.

You sometimes hear one person say to another, "Well, if my poor prayers are worth anything, you may count on having the benefit of them." That sounds like a fine humility; but do you ever hear that same person say, in paying a debt or making a gift, "Here is my check—for what it is worth"? In the great bank of God's Mercy any prayer that bears the signature of loving, trusting faith is taken at its face value, and honored accordingly. The man who promises a friend his prayers "for what they are worth" offers a doubtful gift indeed.

Holy Places.

Not religion only, but human nature itself demands the setting apart of sacred places, and of places appointed for special uses and services. Reverence of manner, devotion of heart and voice, sacredness of place, God commands and man demands, if the best within us to be fed and nourished, and the noblest part of us is to survive and grow. The gifts and graces ministered by churches, erected, consecrated, used, subserve the glory of God and the good of men. They help man to discharge duty, for man's moral task in this world is summed up not in "the survival of the fittest," but in the effort to fit as many as possible to survive. And if gifts and graces center themselves in the church building as a storehouse, ready to be contributed and distributed as helps and blessings to brother men, we that are within may well join in the glad and grateful cry, "Master, it is good for us to be here."—Bishop Tuttle.

We may make some decision today which will determine our destiny. Today the voice of the Lord is sounding within us. Shall we hear, or shall we forbear?—Anon.

"With the Heart Man Believeth."

We may be sure of the facts of the Christian life without being able to explain them. Little children know that their parents love them long before they can explain what love is or use the word "parents." The blind man knew that he said, even though he could not answer the question of the Sanhedrin. St. Paul knew that he had had a great experience, though whether it was "in the body, I know not; or whether of the body, I know not." It is a great comfort to know that it is not absolutely necessary to understand everything intellectually before we can know anything about it. If only we know we have experienced it, we need not worry about the method of it. God knoweth.—J. R. Miller.

A Crisis.

There is opportunity to do good to some one today. There is a battle going on today in which we shall be victors or vanquished. Today the hand of God is open to pour out blessings on each of us. Today the kingdom of God will make some progress within each of us, if we are true to ourselves and our Lord. Today we shall take a long step toward our eternal home. Today something shall be built into our character; shall it be good or bad?

"Soyez le bien venu! Quel est votre regiment? Restez-vous ici? Co prenez-vous?"

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

"Out of the Rut."

Jolts are not always misfortunes; sometimes they prove to be beneficent friends. The highest and holiest sort of habit may become "stale." Even at prayer we are not necessarily devotional. To interrogate, occasionally, our most godly phrases, to cross-examine our almsgiving, to look out fidelity in the face, is highly necessary. A beautiful phrase may become petrified. Decorum may take the place of devotion. And when these things are true of our higher habits, what shall be said of our lower habits? Blest be the jolt with shakes us out of the rut! Even the resulting roughness of the road may be good for us. I know men who have been saved to their better selves by a severe fit of illness, by a business calamity, by the loss of a friend. Ruts are comfortable things for the body, but dangerous for the soul.—George Clark Peck.

The Habit of Being Happy.

Keeping oneself reasonably happy is a duty that ought not to be shirked. Science is telling us these days that to get out of the habit of enjoyment is to get depressed in vitality and vigor, to weaken in efficiency, and to grow old before one's time. There is nothing like laughter—not empty-headed laughter, but the intelligent, wholesome, kindly-hearted kind—to keep people young and fresh and fit for business and the obligations of living. Of course, this is a prescription not easy to live up to always, but it is just about as easy to be happy as to be miserable if one makes up his mind to it, and there is no doubt at all as to which pays the best.—Onward

THE CHURCH IN THE SCHOOL OF WAR.

From the Bishop of a far-western diocese, Bishop Johnson, of Colorado, come these words addressed to his Diocesan Council:

"I have been impressed, as I have gone around the State, with the number of men connected with this Church who have been selected to lead Liberty Loan and Red Cross drives. I am convinced that the number so engaged is entirely out of proportion to our numerical size, and speaks well for the caliber of our Laity. When we can command the same kind of service for Jesus Christ, as we are proud to contribute to our Nation, this Church will make its mark upon this community. It only needs the same sort of consecration to the larger cause, for us to reap the results of our own qualities.

"As it is, the Church has suffered from a lack of initiative on the part of its forceful and energetic Laity."

The Bishop discusses briefly the causes of this failure of the "functioning power of the laity," and mentions, among other things, "the prevalent religious atmosphere of towns and villages in this State, so lacking in virtue and winsome qualities that the average man who is honest with himself turns wearily away from the morbid pettiness of it all" and grows a shell instead of a spiritual backbone. It is a condition that we all recognize, from which even some clergymen are not entirely exempt. And we have been surprised sometimes to see with what a fine spirit these crustaceans have come out of their shells at the call of the country for some service that was real and needful, proving themselves not to belong to the lobster class at all.

From the trenches of the English Army in Flanders and France there has come a book which has deservedly attracted large attention—The Church in the Furnace, by seventeen chaplains of the Church of England in active service. In the preface to this striking book Bishop Gwynne, Deputy Chaplain-General of the British Expeditionary Forces, says:

"Our Empire rose to meet the great occasion in 1914, and created the war machine which is the wonder and admiration of our Allies and the dismay of our enemies. The Germans are reported to boast, as one of their achievements in this war, that they have taught the English to fight and this I suppose is partly true. Our machinery of war has been brought into being to counter the machinery of war our enemies had prepared for years in order to subdue Europe. Rapidly we assimilated their inventions and improved upon their machinery; otherwise we could not have reached the strong position we hold today.

"Our chaplains who are part and parcel of this fighting machine, and, according to the highest military authorities, a real asset to our fighting forces, have studied the stages of development and the inner working of this engine of war.

"This knowledge has given them dreams and visions of a great spiritual fighting machine, which, if realized, may overcome the spiritual foes of humanity—the cause of all wars—and allow the Kingdom of God to operate upon earth.

"In almost every stage of the development of our military machine they have seen a parallel to what the stages of the creation of a true Church Militant might be; namely, a discontent with the present disorder and confusion; a realization of our present faulty intelligence of the task before us, and of our indefinite grasp of our true objective; and the conviction that we must dare to scrap that which is out of date and effete in our methods, so as to be able to mobilize and unify the enormous Christian resources now lying dormant."

So from the foot of the Rockies to the foot of the Alps, Bishops and clergymen and laymen too are facing the issues and asking themselves the questions which the war is thrusting upon their attention with an emphasis which cannot be denied. What is going to be after the war? Wider bounds of political liberty; higher ideals and a broader extension of the principles of democracy; a league of nations pledged to the maintenance of international justice and comity; a long stride forward in the way of human civilization; a new sense of unity and fellowship among the peoples of the earth? Yes, all of that we believe, and thank God. But the war has created conditions and awakened spiritual forces which ought to produce greater things even than these, and will if the Christian Church is prepared to seize the opportunity and engage the potentialities open to her.

The citizenship of America was, in the main, loyal and patriotic before the war began. Men paid their taxes, served on juries and came up to the support of the party on the first Tuesday in November with good-will and alacrity, doing all that was demanded of them as they saw it and devoting the rest of their energy and means to their private affairs. No one realized the splendid temper of their loyalty and the latent power of their patriotism until the war came to call it out. It has been a surprise to the most sanguine and a revelation to the nation itself, to say nothing of the consternation it has occasioned among our enemies who had discounted it lightly. The country has perhaps been surprised, but not for a moment staggered or dismayed at the tremendous demands made upon it. We have never heard it suggested of any task to which we were summoned that it couldn't or wouldn't be done. America hardly thinks of what she is doing and has to do as a sacrifice, but rather as a splendid opportunity, a high and worthy adventure in a great cause for which her people are glad to consecrate themselves.

The effect of this upon individual minds and their composite which we call public sentiment is bound to be marked and for a long time abiding. Soldiers will come back from fields of heroic battle, civilians will turn again from government work or unpaid public service to their old avocations, women will lay down their self-imposed tasks and restrictions, almost with a sigh of regret; for there has been a fine satisfaction in it all in spite of the cost, something that life had not before supplied. Some of them at least will return with new ideals of service, new visions of the value of high enterprise, a new spirit of self-sacrifice, a new conception of human brotherhood. And this because the thing in which they have been engaged was of the sort it was—so big, so worth while, and so certainly approved of God and of all good men as well as their own conscience. What is wanted of them now, since this job which their country, humanity and God gave them to do is well finished? Is there nothing for them to do but to sink back into the old life of selfish competition or ignoble ease and comparative uselessness? Will they never again experience

"The stern joy which warriors feel
In foemen worthy of their steel";

in tasks worthy of their manhood and womanhood?

Wanted, then, that "Moral equivalent of war" of which men are writing and thinking today. We doubt not that it will be found in some degree in the industrial and civic and social world, for the newly aroused crusader's spirit of justice and humanity will be seeking it, and freedom's battle and the emancipation of men will not have been wholly won when the Kaiser shall have signed the terms of peace dictated by his conquerors. But shall the crusades of the future be secularized? Shall the Church, the cause of Christ and His Kingdom distinctively as such, have no large part in the outworking of the new spirit which the war shall have generated, and engage in her service little or nothing of the new idealism, the wider vision and more heroic sense of duty and service? It is for her to answer. But let us be assured that it will be nothing petty or trivial, nothing selfish or partisan or sectarian, nothing which, in the judgment of men who have fought out the greatest conflict in human history, is not worth serving and striving for, that will win their interest and their aid. The Church has enough that is great, heroic and worthy of the best in man for its accomplishment, to engage the whole-hearted service of the wisest, strongest and most courageous of her sons. Will she herself be strong enough, united and broad-minded enough, to apprehend their outlook, to command their allegiance in the new crusades and lead them to victory on new fields of adventure for God and man?

Protestantism and the Latin Soul. By (the Rev.) F. C. Capposi, rector of St. Mary's Church, Wind Gap, Pa. Inscribed to Bishop Rhinelander. The John C. Winston Company, Philadelphia. Pp. 270.

The author is a clergyman lately received into the ministry of this Church from the Roman obedience, and is himself, we believe, an Italian. As stated in his foreword his aim is threefold; to aid the Church in gaining a right attitude toward missionary and evangelizing movements among Latin peoples, to acquaint the American public with the progress of religious thought in Italy especially, and to contribute somewhat to a solution of the problems of Christian unity.

In the second of these purposes and the discussions arising therefrom the author shows himself thoroughly at home, and it is here that the interest and value of his work chiefly lies. "Perhaps in no other country," he says in his opening sentence, "could we find an anti-papal tradition so ancient, so strong and uninterrupted as in Italy"; a statement which will convey surprise to many readers but which he makes good by reference to many great names of olden times and by a wealth of quotations from modern and contemporary sources. Unfortunately, however, this revolt against papacy and the cult for which it stands in the Roman Church, has from the beginning been intellectual, sentimental or political rather than ethical or religious. It has produced not reformation or even organized dissent, but indifference, irreligion and consequent moral decay. The Church is tolerated only among the virile and intelligent, and nothing supplies its place. "The Latin is Catholic, indifferent or atheistic," a description that applies to all countries under the sway of this outward and unspiritual system of ecclesiasticism. The author's study of the psychology of the Latin peoples in accounting for this condition is very illuminating.

In his discussion of Protestantism, however, the author shows himself far less the master of his subject, and the Protestant Churchman at once discovers that he uses the word in a narrow, unhistorical sense which is at once confusing and misleading. Protestantism as he conceives it is the product of German psychology and character. Other phases of it, English, Scotch, French, American, for instance, are quite ignored, as well as its essential quality. It was no great task, therefore, to explain why this German Protestantism failed to commend itself to the Latin mind and spirit. No thoughtful person would imagine that it could. It must be a Latin Protestantism, not German or Scotch or any other foreign brand, that will appeal to the Latin soul. But suppose one conceives of Protestantism in its true and historic meaning, as the setting-free of the truth of the gospel to make its own unadulterated appeal to the conscience and reason of men. Then, if the word of God be true and the gospel of Jesus Christ is a catholic gospel, there is room and need for Protestantism for the Latin as for every other human soul. And herein lies the justification and the obligation of Protestant Missions to Latin countries. If they mean an attempt to impose Germanism or Anglicanism or American Episcopalianism or what not upon the Latin soul they are doubtless doomed to the failure they deserve. If they mean carrying the gospel in its purity to those who know it not and have rejected a travesty of it, then they are a duty which the gospel itself imposes upon the followers of the Master, and which have not failed of success. To them also the gospel is the "power of God unto salvation." That the general form in which English Protestantism is normally embodied in the Anglican Church is that which will commend itself, with some modifications, to the Latin soul for its own reformed Church, we are glad to believe with our author. That this will be furthered by a closer conformity of the Anglican or American Episcopal Church to the customs or traditions of the Latin Church as it is we do not believe. The Protestantism of this Church is the guarantee of its true democratic and evangelical Catholicism, around which, as we trust with this sincere and amiable writer, the unity of the Church universal will one day take shape.

We acknowledge with thanks the receipt of a copy of the Memorial Sermon on the life and character of the late Right Rev. Alfred Macgill Randolph, preached in Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, May 12, 1918, by the Rev. Dr. Randolph H. McKim. It is a worthy tribute to the great Bishop such as few were so well qualified to make as the preacher. Dr. McKim speaks of the splendid personality of Bishop Randolph and of his qualities as pastor and preacher, but dwells more at large upon his place as a theologian—an exponent of the gospel and defender of the faith—and the profound convictions and intellectual courage which so distinguished him among men of lesser mould. The vestry of Emmanuel Church have done a good service in preserving this sermon in printed form.

THE SPIRIT OF FORGIVENESS.

Mr. Editor: May one of your readers express her deep gratitude for the editorial in your issue of August 24? It is one of the very finest utterances which has been written upon the subject since the war began, and it sounds the note of true forgiveness, which one seldom hears nowadays with any degree of fullness or purity. We find even the most consecrated clergymen so athrill with the horror of Germany's infamies, so afire with zeal to stamp them out, that for the German they find no place for forgiveness.

Even Dr. Lyman Abbott, usually so mild and broad-minded, is quoted, in effect, as saying that the plea, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," does not apply to the Germans, for they do know what they do. Do they indeed "know what they do?" Does not the hideousness of sin dawn upon people only as the light of the Holy Spirit shows it to them? How can people, however "cultured," know the depth of their iniquity unless His light is theirs? The thick darkness of the German mind is shown by the deeds for which the German army is responsible. In the final analysis, does anyone who sins know what he does? Of the crime by which the Holy Lamb of God was nailed to the Cross, of the greater crime which broke His loving, tender heart, who, even of the Archangels, can know the depth? Of the degree to which the sin of anyone has plunged him into hell, only God knows; how much use it is to pray for anyone only God knows—we are bidden to pray. Can we pray with hearts full of hatred, thirsting for vengeance, eager to "take it out" of the person for whom we pray?

The forgiveness of God is not only pardon, it is cleansing. If we keep this element of forgiveness in the foreground much of the fog surrounding the whole subject may be cleared up; also if we bear in mind that exemption from the penalty of deterioration of character and the consequent suffering, which follows upon breaking God's laws (which are the laws of our very being) are no part of forgiveness. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap;" but by God's forgiveness the very harvest of suffering may be made a means for cleansing the sin, may be a pathway to the loving heart of Him who afflicts in order that He may restore—never simply to make the sinner suffer.

Shall not this be our attitude toward our foes? We have been permitted, all imperfect and soiled as we are, to become the instruments for the cleansing of Germany. In so far as we permit ourselves to become infected instruments, to that degree shall we fail to that degree will God's plan for her be hindered. Shall we not, repenting our own iniquities, pray that our hearts may be sterilized from the deadly infection of hate by the pure fire, the consuming fire of holy love? True, we are training to kill the bodies of the Germans and to those of us who hold the idea of a true forgiveness, a cleansing forgiveness, to us, beyond others, a victory which would stop short of being able to dictate peace terms is abhorrent. But when, blinded and mad, Germany shall have been disarmed and bound, how can we if we share her blindness, be able to dictate any terms of a lasting peace—a peace which will be the peace of righteousness? How shall our work stand if ours is the spirit of the avenger instead of that of the surgeon? The avenger would take no pains to leave life in the body, the surgeon cuts out only the sore. Surely in the land of Suther and Herder there is a remnant. All the four iniquities of William and his "Potsdam gang" and their brutalized tools should not blind us to the desire to give that remnant a chance to send its healing flood of life through the body of Germany, bound and sick unto death.

O Lamb of God, Who takest away the sins of the world, grant us Thy peace!

CLARA MacC. DEPRIEST.

NINETEENTH CENTENARY OF CHRIST'S MINISTRY.

Mr. Editor:

It is a long time before the 1900th anniversary of the ministry of our Lord here on earth, but probably not too soon to be considering some way of living over these precious years given for our salvation. It has occurred to me that it would be a splendid thing if the Church would map out a plan by which we could follow through the course of the three years of His nineteenth centenary the steps taken by Christ as He walked the pathway of His earthly life. Nothing could make the life of the Master more real or vivid; nothing could be more forceful in calling the attention of the world to the reality of the visit of the Son of God to this earth. The problem of the Christian Church is to make Christ real to the multitudes everywhere. What could be more powerful than a faithful portrayal of the life that Jesus lived?

Advice to the Parents and Friends of Wounded Soldiers.

By Eugene M. Camp.

The war hospitals in the United States, completed or to be ready within a month at most, contain in even figures 100,000 beds. With 4,000,000 men in France it is the Government's estimate that 200,000 beds will be needed in hospitals here. To provide such by next June is the Government's task. There are twenty-eight general hospitals, located in the sixteen draft districts, besides many other hospitals, some war and some civilian.

All wounded men likely to recover and return to the ranks are to be kept in France. Owing to proficiency in medical skill this number is far larger than in any previous war. Wonderfully good care, freedom from red tape, and remarkable rebuilding cures, these are characteristics of the American hospital service in France.

Immediately wounded men in France arrive at a permanent hospital a Government provided person, either a nurse or an officer, is charged with the duty of writing to parents. It is not left to chance. So that parents whose sons are reported wounded, and who receive a wire from the Adjutant General at Washington, may count upon receiving letters within four to five weeks, perhaps a little sooner. Meanwhile parents are assured by the Government that no further news by wire is good news.

It has now been arranged, at enormous expense to the Government, to place in the hands of the Adjutant General at Washington, General Peter C. Harris, who succeeds General McCain, weekly information of the progress toward recovery of all wounded men in France. Application to the Adjutant General will bring news. In writing for such news parents are urged to be explicit in name, arm of service, and to write plainly, and to avoid needless explanation. Simply ask for the information. The Government has no time for explanations which you may wish to make.

Wounded men who cannot expect ever to return to service will begin to arrive at New York within the next fortnight. Some are coming in already. Of the 100,000 beds in the country, 25,000 in even figures are in hospitals in and near New York. There are also 10,000 beds for sick men from embarkation camps, who have not yet sailed overseas. The plan of concentrating all hospitals would have cost the Government less, but it was felt the effect upon the people living near such hospital would be depressing. Parents would have to travel a long distance to see their sons. The men themselves would be far from home.

The twenty-eight general hospitals, located in the sixteen draft districts, will receive the wounded men whose homes are nearest to them. This plan will enable parents to visit them with the least possible distance to travel. Further distribution is not to be made because it is desired to provide expert medical ability, and also expert consultative experience. Much value is attached to the latter. All that has been learned by doctors in France, England and Italy has been transmitted to America.

If parents determine to leave their homes and go to hospitals to be with their sons, ill or wounded, they are urged to take enough money with them to pay their return railroad fares. Strange to say, many parents are going to New York without taking this precaution. Do not take with you sons and daughters, uncles and aunts. Railroad travel is expensive, and transportation is scarce. Leave everybody at home who can be left there.

If you go to New York remember that that city is overcrowded. Hotels are filled. So are boarding houses. The same is likely to be true of all cities near which are the general hospitals. Before starting secure place to stop in the city to be visited, at prices you can afford to pay. Write to the Red Cross Chapter, or if you are to go to New York write to the Institute of Applied Christianity, 52 East Twenty-fifth Street. If you are in that city telephone Madison Square 1966. Ask for Mrs. Adams, a soldier mother. On arriving in New York, if it is to that city you go, look up the Red Cross booth maintained at both Grand Central and Pennsylvania Stations. Do not ask questions of strangers, or accept advice from them. The Red Cross booths are provided to serve you. Similar booths are to be found in other stations of cities near to general hospitals.

In New York there is close co-operation between the Red Cross booths at the stations and the institute named. The latter has a series of entertainment houses, devoted solely to the care of soldier mothers and other relatives of sick and wounded men. The series is not for the general public, and persons other than those mentioned are urged not to make inquiries. So heavy is the burden that only relatives of those boys who are sick in hospitals can be cared for.

Names of all sick men in all hospitals are reported daily to hospital relief sections of all Red Cross county chapters. These are not the booths in the railroad stations. In New York the Institute of Applied Christianity, 52 East Twenty-fifth Street, maintains a Central Bureau, and can tell, through co-operation with the Red Cross, in what hospital any man is, what is his condition toward recovery, how to reach the hospitals, and what are the prospects of the case. The service is free to relatives of the men, and to all others who have valid claim to know.

The Red Cross, and with it the institute, furnishes responsible men and women to visit men in hospitals. Promiscuous visiting is not permitted. Great care is exercised in selecting visitors, and system is put into the visiting. In cases of death, especially if parents be not present, help is extended. The institute and its work in this line are supported by business men, chiefly in the Madison Square district, and the work approved by foremost ministers and laymen of all churches. Automobiles are provided for health rides, given by arrangement with the medical directors.

Finally, the institute named maintains a Church Bureau, and provides trained men to be stationed in the War Camp Community Units, in the Soldier and Sailor Clubs, and in the Officers' Clubs on Sunday mornings to answer questions about churches, their location, hours of services, names of preachers, and to arrange for parties where considerable numbers of sittings are needed. All bodies are served—

Roman Catholic, Protestant, Jew.

The service is open to all relatives of enlisted men. Through this week, day or night, questions about churches of New York and near-by towns are answered over the telephone. Co-operation is had in this work with the churches, with the War Camp Community Service, the Red Cross, the newspapers, and with the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the Salvation Army and the Knights of Columbus. In cases of serious illness and death in hospitals ministers are provided, introductions are furnished, and everything is done that the churches of New York ought to do in such cases.

A special invitation is given by the institute to soldier and sailor mothers to write concerning their worries. Whatever the service, let the institute try to assist in it. Often if it does not relate to New York the institute can be of help. There is no obligation whatever, and no charge will be made or pay accepted. Do not worry over this difficulty or that. The great embarkation camps are to be busy for months if 4,000,000 American boys are to be put into France by next June. From them will arise scores of errands in the minds and hearts of mothers of America. The institute is set to serve.

(The editor would suggest that friends of soldiers and sailors serving abroad preserve this article for reference if needed.)

THE PASSING OF A SPECIES.

The Rev. Oscar Woodward Zeigler.

There has been a deal of a plaint raised about the dwindling attendance of students at the Theological Seminaries. I remember reading quite recently an article entitled "The Theological Student, an Extinct Species," thereby showing a larger faith in the embodiment of the Church life than in the spirit thereof. Not alone does the letter kill, but the too exclusive contemplation of it throws the mind into a malaise. As a figure of instruction I will keep to the biological simile. These have a vitality all their own; possibly because they arise out of what is man's most richly suggestive intuition of God's rule in the unfolding and enrichment of life. I will cling to the figure, too, because it borrows something of my conclusion. For, after all, that fact would not be calamitous. A species exacts for itself only, even though it may be incidentally useful to the whole hierarchy of life. It may be, considering the shattered chaos of human ideas of the present, quite well that the theological student, qua se, should dry up and ultimately disappear. In the development of many forms of life, and in the development of all forms of thought, there is what is known in scientific terminology as a "resting stage." In this stage the creature, e. g., the caterpillar, ceases to be active, becomes static as though the process of life had terminated, only to repolarize its life, and to expand into a new and more complete form of living. May it not be that the theological student, as functioning the vocal and expressional attitude of the Church towards its life and growth, is going through a like period of effacement from which a more resplendent, forceful and uplifting ministry may emerge? There is certainly no theoretical objection to this notion; on the contrary, there is much good precedence therefor! I have recently been perusing an old devotional autobiographical confession of another, and pre-seminary, age which I had exhumed from its burial in a forgotten library—once a tool for a work-a-day man. With a deprecatory smile I realized what a change had to come upon the whole nexus of thought through which the mind of my author moved, which produced the atmosphere of its being, before one could arrive at the common viewpoint of my own seminary days. To become reminiscent, it seems that my own experience bridges acquaintance with two distinct species of theologues. There was that species, a survival of that of my weeping author, which grew up in an atmosphere which we may name, "a conviction of sin." A useful species, occupying a veritable truth which the world today considers obsolescent. I rather think God has in His hand the scourge which will drive men to care for these things once more. This species was not even in the days of my earlier studies a flourishing plant. It was rather a curious exotic to be softly considered and dealt gently with. This poor survival had been driven to the crannies by the prevailing type of that day—a species which believed in a young man's age—a forward march of humanity into its full occupancy of the Christian heritage. This species seemed to have varied from a primitive, "Aspiration for leadership." It was a robust species; it pinned its flag to muscular Christianity, with a saving grace of wisdom and faith. It was a vigorous, withal sometimes a reedy, rank, growth which has fruited. Its taste was to my discriminating palate bitter and ashy. It is this latter species which is now becoming extinct, as did the former before it. Quite naturally, too. The reasoned philosophy of humanity has come to an impasse. The only sanctioning authority is force; material, pulverizing, annihilating force. Humanity has denied the validity of spiritual intuitions. It knows no better theory of human constitution than of Lamech's Song of the Sword. Whether or not the Church has failed in its divine mission is at least debatable; it is not debatable that it has come to naught in its assumptive leadership of civilization. Civilization, spare the word, and Christianity are not neighbors today in the same street. I believe this will really prove a gain to Christianity. The function of the all-leader of civilization is quite foreign to Christianity's real office: which is the cultivation of the quiet life of the soul. Are we to believe that the life of God's spirit in Christ's Church, in the heart of man, if you please, is no longer to go where it listeth? That the Church is so incapable of variation that this last type of the adolescent priest is the full and complete form? Absurd to imagine. What the world needs, and what I am convinced the Church will in the future, and that quite near, produce from its life to satisfy this need, is a ministry that shall bud forth from an "Intuition of Faith." It is quite possible that this order of the ministry may not be propagatable in the seminary-as-it-is, or flourish in the Church as at present constituted; then again it may in both. But this is a certain fact: the Church of Christ will never fail of a ministry because its young men are unresponsive to the high vision of life, heroism and usefulness, which they may glimpse in the divine life of its founder. Even if the old men should grow disheartened because of the wide disparity of the ministry which circumstances may permit to the priest from this beatific vision. They, at least, will feel the pulse of life in their souls, and see the blossoming life, howbeit, afar. No! I would rather say the very conditions, which appear so deplorable, are indicative of the great hope I have, that the Church of Christ is expecting, and not vainly, a revived and a rejuvenescence of its ministry into some new and wonderful attainment of character which will give an inspiring realization of the intuition which labours in its heart. Species may grow extinct, but not before their office has been fulfilled in the complex of life, nor before a new body has been made ready for the newer being that is in the borning.

CHRISTIAN LOVE AND HATRED OF ENEMIES.

From a Sermon by the Rev. J. MacBride Sterrett, D. D.

If one has any philosophy of history, any faith in the progress of mankind in real freedom; if one holds to one increasing purpose running through the ages; if one believes in the evolution of the higher out of the lower; if one traces the ascent of man out of the brute through the countless ages of struggle, then one can, one must view this present war as a veritable Armageddon of the hosts of evil against the attained moral results of this struggle. The moral values of the race are at stake. We should have Christ's own hot righteous indignation. We cannot pray God to spare their lives. We must kill their tools, the German soldiers. We must strip them of their physical existence, though we may pray for such purgatorial punishment in the other world as may lead them to repentance.

The war is the one great moral issue of this day and generation. No moral man can be neutral or a pacifist. Arm for the fight. Send son, brother, husband—all who can go and kill!—Kill till they repent and cease their crimes against humanity, their wrecking all the hard-won moral values of the ages. Kill, not only for the good of others, but also for their own real good. Love them with the ethical love that wills not their persistence in evil, but their salvation from it. In it all have an intense will for the real good of the great German nation—for its restoration to leadership in art, literature, music, philosophy—all that will make her again the leader in idealism.

Have a righteous indignation; hate their present brutal atrocities, their worship of the god of physical force. Fight against those who aid and abet their evil in our own country. Demand utter loyalty to the cause as the cause of God and humanity.

That is what we should do in this great moral world crisis. We should seek to arouse the moral indignation that will permit no neutrality, but make us cry out: "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell and of mankind?" Is it not possible for us now to utter the woes, the damnation Christ uttered then against the enemies of man without violating his other precept: "Love your enemies"?

If ever, then surely now, "The Son of God goes forth to war." If ever, then surely now, ours is a righteous war. In a window in Fifth Avenue are displayed some cartoons of German atrocities. One looking at them says he "finds himself the victim of a strange feeling." Something happens to the muscles of his jaws. His finger tips tingle and his fists involuntarily clench. An awful desire to take some one by the throat grips his whole being. That is the feeling of burning indignation, of righteous wrath, of hatred of evil that we all have or ought to have. Pity the man who has not felt this grip ever since the Germans inflicted such unspeakably inhuman atrocities upon the Belgians.

But can a Christian feel this grip and not be ashamed? Or can he not rather recognize its likeness to the moral indignation of the Master? We are sending our boys over there to kill as many as possible, and can we not do it with a good Christian conscience? We are not hating our personal enemies. We are not resenting a personal injury. It is against the enemies of mankind, the enemies of God's kingdom. The Psalmist cries out, "Do not I hate them that hate thee? I hate them with a perfect hatred." There is a ring of moral indignation in this cry that finds, or is coming to find echo in our own souls. It is God's enemies who incite us to anger. It need not, should not have the element of revenge or deeds of retaliation. Our boys are killing them by the thousands without this feeling of personal enmity. We pray that they may be kept free from feelings of hatred and deeds of brutal retaliation. And yet we pray God that they may kill as many of the enemy, and as soon as possible—innocent and helpless and pitiable tools of tyrannical militarism—kill as many as may be needed to break and destroy the brutal force that would wreck the results of ages of moral conflict. Let us have no feeling of shame, no hypocrisy in the matter. We need have none. Horror and pity, yes! But how much more for the whole world now in coming generations if we do not fight to the finish and win.

Righteous anger! perhaps only the Master could feel that. With us his weak disciples, there is always danger of the very feeling of hatred against which he warns us, and of acts of brutal retaliation—an eye for an eye—two eyes for one. Brutal retaliation, reprisals in kind—England has been tempted to this. God grant that we and she and all the allies may never resort to the Hunnish cruelties and vandalism of the Germans.

Retaliation and revenge? No, that is not Christian. Damn the soul of the German nation? No, save the German nation. Restore her to her former true greatness. Burn her in retributory flames? No! Burn her with the purgatorial reformatory fire of war. It is not unrighteous to desire defeat for them, as they are, in order to bring them by repentance unto what they have been. Retaliation and revenge. That is the danger in our righteous indignation. As Christians we cannot thus hate. This sort of hatred is soul-destroying—suicide of our own souls and murder of those of our enemies. This is not righteous indignation. The Kaiser and his colleagues, cold, calculating destroyers of the moral values of mankind, satanic in arrogance and selfishness, more than satanic in atrocities—well, we should have the good-will for such meet punishment as will purge them thoroughly—the consuming fire of the wrath of the Lamb to burn out all that is burning up their souls. And so we can and should pray for them, pray not for their pleasure and happiness and success. Woe and damnation to them in their present state of mind. The consuming purgatorial fire of the good-will of God and man for their repentance. Such be their portion speedily for their own real good. This is the form that our ethical love must take toward them unrepentant.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

XL. More Work for the Laity.

A vestryman in Virginia has said: "The Episcopal Church has been standing on one leg too long. It is time for us to rest some weight on the lay leg, and not leave the burden entirely to the clerical leg." (Southern Churchman for May 25, 1918.)

There is more work in the Church for the laity to do that they can do, and that they ought to be doing. By doing something in the Church, they become interested in the work of the Church, and when they have become thoroughly interested in the work of the Church a way will be found to get the money needed to support that work.

Indirectly, here is one way to get money for the work of the Church; get the interest of people. And to get the interest of the people, set them to work in doing something in the Church. If possible, get them to be doing not something trivial, but something of importance.

If possible, set the men at work. What can they do that needs to be done?

First, this church needs lay preachers, devout, earnest men, not ordained to the ministry, but with some ability to speak in public. There were prophets of the Old Testament, not of the priesthood, not sons of Aaron (nor Levites). Could we not now make more use of earnest, devout Christian laymen, well instructed in God's word and in Church teachings? Let them be licensed as lay preachers. Let them be authorized, for special occasions and on special subjects, to speak before any of our congregations. The work of lawyers, physicians, teachers and other public men has a moral side, closely related to true religion. Subjects on which they are qualified to speak are of vital interest to a community. Their work, wisely directed under the guidance of bishops and clergy, might thus supplement the work of pastors, and also interest others of the laity.

Again, there is work for devout laymen as lay readers. Let more of them be invited to read the lessons of Holy Scripture, or take some other part in the services of morning and evening prayer, when a clergyman is present. They and the people become accustomed to this, and they are better prepared to take all of the church service in case of the absence of a clergyman.

As to reading of sermons by lay readers, but few congregations will keep up an interest unless special attention is paid in selecting and using those sermons. Something alive for the day, something fresh and of interest is needed. Could not some bureau, under the direction of some bishop, be charged with the selection of suitable sermons fitted for each Sunday and sent to such lay readers as would use them? At any rate, there is a wide field for usefulness for lay readers in the Church.

In cities and towns there are jails and prisons, orphanages, homes for the aged and infirm; in the country there are school-houses, country poor-houses; in some localities mining or lumber camps. In many such places religious services would be welcomed on a Sunday. The singing of familiar hymns, short Scripture lessons and prayers, and then an address on some Bible topic such as many lay readers might learn to give, would be both welcome and useful in many a place. Clergy of the Church should sometimes go to these places, but their work should be supplemented by the lay worker. Young people should go with him and assist in singing and in other ways. Here is work for laity, both for the young and for adults.

Bishop Thurston, of Eastern Oklahoma, has said: "Young men are perfectly willing to give even their lives in a cause which appeals to them as really worth while." Important words. Our young people especially need to be trained to see that the work of the Church is a cause really worth while. And one way to train them in their childhood and youth is to give them something to do that they can do and lead them, little by little, to see that the work of the Church is a great and noble cause. By taking some part in it, as they are able, let the cause appeal to their hearts as something really worth their life's service.

By such means some young men will be led to devote their lives to the work of the ministry. But the interest of all, young and old, fathers and mothers, is needed. Money, too, will be needed. But first and most important of all is to give the laity important work for them to do. Let the burden be placed upon them and not solely upon the clergy. In our Sunday schools are opportunities for training the young. Little by little, as they are fitted, let responsibilities and burdens be laid upon children and young people. Let them see that such work is "really worth while." More real work then should be laid upon the laity. Interest will be aroused, and the needed money will follow. Do not place money first. That is only a means towards ends far more important.

MILITARY TRAINING IN COLLEGES; A FURTHER AND MORE LIBERAL PROVISION.

By the last ruling of the War Department students who are in the Students' Army Training Corps at college will be at absolutely no expense for their education while at college. The government furnishes everything and pays all tuition fees, board, room rent and in addition gives the pay of a soldier, $30 a month.

This will begin October 1st. Until that date from the day the college opens students will pay their own expenses.

As to how long a student can stay in college, the government makes no promises, except that no one will be called earlier by being at college than if he had stayed at home. But if the government decided that a man can be of more service by being kept at college, he will be kept there to complete his education, or as much of it as the government thinks best.

When a student's number is reached in the draft, his case will be considered on its merits by the United States officer in command at the college, the president of the college and Colonel Rees, who has charge of all the student-soldiers in the United States. No such opportunity has ever been given young men to continue their education at college and at the same time to do what the government thinks the largest service to the country. A student who is under eighteen pays all his fees and his board as usual, but when he reaches the draft age, he will be cared for as described above.

General Theological Seminary.

Three trustees of the General Theological Seminary will be elected this year by the alumni to fill vacancies caused by expiration of term of office. Classes whose year of graduation terminates in "eight" or "three" will make nominations before Monday, September 16th. Official ballot sheets will be prepared on that date. The polls open at the Seminary on October 1st and close on December 15th.

National Convention Brotherhood of St. Andrew, East Northfield, Mass., August 14-21.

The idea of holding the National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew at East Northfield has certainly commended itself to all who have had the happiness of seeing it realized. The wonderful influence of the place, where physical and spiritual beauty are one and the world which is to be seems almost already here, has been felt by many of our people to whom before Northfield was little more than a name. Thirty-six States, forty dioceses, were represented, but naturally the great majority of the delegates and visitors came from the first, second and third provinces. We were honored by the presence of seven bishops—the Rt. Revs. T. F. Davies, D. D., H. R. Hulse, D. D., A. S. Lloyd, D. D., J. N. McCormick, D. D., C. T. Olmsted, D. D., G. I. Reese, D. D., and W. T. Summer, D. D. A very good proportion were on hand at the very start and attended the reception given by Bishop Davies at the Northfield Inn on Wednesday evening, August 14th.

The daily celebrations of the Holy Communion in Sage Chapel were largely attended, and the devotional addresses by the Rev. F. H. Sill, O. H. C., and Rev. C. D. Broughton, of the Church of the Ascension, Buffalo, were both uttered and listened to in the most earnest spirit.

The business of the convention was fortunately dispatched very quickly and satisfactorily, in much less than the allotted four hours.

President Bousall read the report of the Council, emphasizing the war work: Sixty-eight laymen have served, forty-six being now in the field, and the International Y. M. C. A. has expressed its appreciation of the Brotherhood's work along lines of personal religion. He promised the Juniors a new National Secretary and spoke of other new officers and of the provincial organization in provinces one to five. As regards the state of the chapters, about a third of the Seniors and many Juniors are in the service of the nation, some chapters having been entirely wiped out. Those at home must take up the work of those who are away and all of us must counteract false teaching.

On Friday the Nominating Committee reported and the Council was elected. Telegrams and letters were read from nine bishops and fourteen leaders of the Brotherhood who could not be present. Mr. C. M. Alexander, the great song leader, told us about the Pocket Testament League with its four million members, including President Wilson, Vice-President Marshall, Secretary Lansing, Secretary Daniels and Henry Ford. One thousand men a day are joining.

He taught us one of the new songs, "Give Your Heart to Jesus," and presented Pocket Song Books to the first four who sang it.

The second hour was devoted for three days to a series of addresses on "The Bible in the Personal Life," by the Rev. Floyd W. Tompkins. He spoke of the Bible in its devotional use, as a revelation of Jesus, and as a help in practical life.

Dr. William H. Jefferys, so long a famous medical missionary and now Superintendent of the Philadelphia City Mission, made two remarkable appeals in his own inimitable, mystical style for the development of the prayer life.

The third hour on Saturday was occupied by a conference on the "Devotional Life of the Family," led by W. H. Turner, the Treasurer of the Brotherhood.

President Bousall's talks on "The Power of Personal Influence" were most helpful. He pointed out the universality of influence, but the lack of plan in its use. God Himself is now revealed not in His power alone, or even in personal form, but by the operation of the Holy Spirit. But spiritual power is centered in personality.

Daily at noon we stopped for five minutes to sing the National Anthem and to pray for victory and our troops. Mr. Bousall emphasized our right to ask success and the need of prayer if we would win.

The afternoons were intended for recreation and we did enjoy walks and drives up the great hills and over the State roads. But little by little we found special needs developing and little groups sprung up to talk about them. Chief of these were the conference on the Prayer Book by Bishop Olmsted, the discussion of the war work under Mr. Finney, the Mission Study Class, led by Dr. Sturgis, and the local delegation meetings. As usual, it was in these special gatherings that we came closer together and drew from each other the true personal contributions. It might not be out of place in this very connection to suggest that another year the program might profitably be lightened a little so as to give more time for just such impromptu events. The Round Top Sunset Meetings have always been the great occasion for life work appeals and decisions, and so it was with our convention.

James H. Falconer, of New York, exhibited the reconsecration of our lives in his story of Rescue Missions, giving a vivid account of the reaction on the workers and the reform in the lives, not only of degraded sinners, but also of men and women who, though still respectable in public, have yet been in the grasp of some evil habit. The central fact is the need of God and trust in Him. Not only church services, but rescue missions are a blessing to ourselves and others.

Leon C. Palmer, General Secretary of the Alabama Sunday School Association, made one of the clearest, most illuminating talks of the whole convention. He showed why the adolescent from twelve to twenty-four years of age is the hardest problem we have to deal with.

Frederick S. Tittsworth, of Philadelphia, gave a fine call to laymen for service in the Church. The priesthood of the laity means that the layman is to sacrifice himself, presenting his own body a living sacrifice acceptable to God.

The call to the sacred ministry was given by Rev. Bernard I. Bell, who came in his uniform as Civilian Chaplain of the Great Lakes Training Station. His basis of appeal was the hopeless inadequacy of any religious body to meet the world's need and the purely superficial effect of the Church on the soldiers. The soldiers have abandoned all ideals and are governed by personal influences. Christianity must be preached as service and only by real men of God, whereas the quality of the clergy is steadily deteriorating. Men demand not coddling and back-patting, but leadership by those who believe they can do anything. The new clergymen must be confident they might have been successful at whatever they had chosen to do. They must see how men are thinking, be brave, and follow Christ.

It may be added that the extremely pessimistic tone of this address acted as a tonic, and from then on all those who had had a personal knowledge of the men in other camps and especially at the front seemed to rise to the occasion and "out" Hankey Hankey.—From Sunday evening with Bishop Lloyd till the last words on Wednesday morning the keynote was Victory.

John Wood was the natural choice of a man to call to service in the mission field. How are we to find out God's plan and work for each of us?

The need of man power will bring Orientals in swarms, and will they bring their unbelief with them? The call is the great need. The missionary goes to interpret God to seekers. What are the qualifications? The absence of positive disqualification and unsurpassable obstacle, a sense of humor, and good digestion, linguistic ability and fellowship.

The last Round Top was led by Benjamin F. Finney, who gave the call to membership in the Brotherhood, pointing out that many who were living the Brotherhood ideals had never joined our fellowship, and that the machinery is only a very effective means of giving a point of contact with other men. He urged particularly the use of the hand-book as a most valuable aid. Mr. Finney, in his usual quiet and simple way, was really a great figure in this convention, and conducted not only the group on war work, but also another on the formation of chapters.

The great evening addresses were in every way notable and successful in carrying out their purpose, to give glowing and inspiring pictures of the progress of the kingdom.

The opening one by Bishop McCormick set an almost impossible standard which was lived up to by the others. Just returned from the actual front line trenches, he used as his subject "The Church and the Nation" as a mere title around which to group his vivid impressions of the men and events in France.

Our men overseas are reacting to this idea and realizing that everyone is in this war of all races, all religions. Each man we send over represents to Europeans all America. (1) Fighting spirit: They are beyond question in accuracy and coolness. (2) Spirit in hospital. Their good humor and self-control are wonderful; they are unselfish and appreciative. We must appreciate them and stand by their cross. (3) Religious spirit: Equal to the other two; their demand for the Sacraments, religious tone of letters and desire for prayers at home. He spoke of the high position of Bishop Brent, the deeply religious attitude of General Pershing, and the good work of the Brotherhood men. The religion of the army will be the religion of the future.

We must back up all this spirit, looking up, out, forward and lending a hand. Our enemies are doomed because they are looking down.

No less ringing was "The Church and Social Service," as presented by the Rev. John Henry Hopkins, of Chicago. He took as a sort of text, "Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only." Each one of us is part of a great force and must not be safely in the fold. The kingdom is more important than personal salvation, and the head cannot act without the body.

Saturday night the preparation for the Corporate Communion was conducted by the Rev. C. LeV. Brine, of Portsmouth, N. H., who divided his address into three distinct sections separated by devotions.

The Corporate celebration took place early the next morning, Bishop Davies being celebrant, Bishop Lloyd epistoler, Bishop Olmsted gospeller and the Rev. Charles Le V. Brine server. About 250 men received the Sacrament. Immediately after the close of this service, and after each of the succeeding early celebrations, the flag of our country was raised on the campus in front of Weston Hall by Samuel Sayre in his white uniform as a member of the hospital corps of the navy, and the National Anthem was sung.

The anniversary service, consisting of Morning Prayer and sermon, was held in the auditorium, Dean Hodges taking it throughout and preaching on "Goodness Plus."

A hymn written by Rev. John Mills Gilbert under the inspiration of Bishop McCormick's address, and intended for the Corporate Communion, was sung at the later service, and the Brotherhood Service Flag was dedicated.

Sunday afternoon the Juniors had an open conference on "The Boys' Christian Life," in which they not only gave many truly wise and helpful suggestions, but also enjoyed themselves immensely. The formal addresses were by Charles E. Cole, of Baltimore (Business), Fred J. Bell, of Norfolk, Va. (Home), and Gordon H. Thornton, of South Manchester, Conn. (Church), but the free expression of opinions by the older boys was the best and most important feature, even if the assurance and enthusiasm of adolescence did bring out some rather extreme views.

Sunday evening we heard Bishop Lloyd on "The Progress of the Church's Mission," which he defined as letting man know that Christ has brought him to his own.

A third Bishop, Rt. Rev. T. I. Reese, Coadjutor of Southern Ohio, continued the inspiring work on Monday night, speaking of the Church and Reconstruction. The war has created nothing and the new work must begin at once as the soldiers open up the way for liberty and God's kingdom.

On the last evening Courtenay Barber described very simply the forward movement, and Bishop Lloyd told in a most interesting and helpful way his own personal relations with the order.

The morning hours of the last three days of the convention were occupied with shorter and more practical talk and more open conferences than the first three. Walter Kidd conducted a wonderful conference on the army and navy work, at which a great many intensely interesting facts were related by him and several of the camp secretaries. Mr. Kidd told of the formation of the Council, which is in connection with the War Commission, and is planning a great program to outlast the war. F. S. Titsworth rejoiced in the way volunteers had come to do this hard work, regardless of financial loss.

He explained how the fifteen office workers digest reports, keep the Honor Roll of 50,000, correspond with 400 stations, only forty-one of which are manned. He described the information bureau. Nearly fifty prospective clergymen known. Shelby emphasized the importance of demanding big tasks. The work in France is to be in the training area where time is freer. He needs men and prayers. Five of the camp secretaries described their experiences, all of which showed both sympathy with the ideals of the soldiers and the most cheerful optimism. Meehan, at Camp Hancock, found a permanent development of righteousness and fellowship. He formed company groups as a haven for the whole army. There were 1,800 of our men and hundreds were confirmed. Mr. and Mrs. Percy Knapp, at Camp Meade, specialized in hospital work. The boys were homesick and rejoiced over Christmas bags, jellies and barber outfits.

Walenta, at Camp Custer and four other camps, found the first military chapter and a club-house at Battle Creek. He told of the night celebrations of the Communion at Camp Merritt before embarkations. In one day eight were baptized and several confirmed.

Gordon Reis worked in Palestine at first and saw between five and six thousand in one meeting. He spoke of the Pocket Testament League and the Christmas Communion in the desert. At Quantico Marine Camp 500 were present and 200 received at a farewell celebration. Are we at home worth dying for, or as narrow as ever?

Goodall, at Kelly field, dealt with small tent groups of ten or twelve, gradually grew in size. At Camp Dix he had access to every barrack and the warm commendation of General Scott. The men do want religion and stopped profanity. The groups will continue on ship and in France because of keymen. The meetings are quiet and dignified and everyone takes part.

Finney, the Chief Secretary, closed with a general view of the situation and mentioned the choir of 100 men at Camp Custer.

A resolution of appreciation was sent to the workers who were unable to leave their forces.

Mr. Leon C. Palmer developed more fully and with even greater clearness his Round Top talk on Monday.

Then Robert E. Anderson, Secretary of the Board of Religious Education of Virginia and Chairman of the Convention, spoke of the infancy of Sunday school work in any really effective sense and asked for a bigger appeal. Officers should not be mere figureheads or machines, but should develop personal relations and train up assistants from the school.

George T. Ballachey, of Buffalo, presented the great missionary value of lay readers the first thing Tuesday. Particular stress was to be laid on rural and suburban fields. Boys should be trained to take part in the services and so develop gradually. Institutions are also an excellent chance for lay work. He told of the Lay Readers' League in Buffalo, and urged its method for other places, provided it was carefully supervised. The two stories of attendance campaigns, by Charles Cain, of Wissaluckon, and Ernest S. Inglis, of Chicago, and John D. Alexander's words on the Men's Communion led to excellent general discussion and brought out many good suggestions. Dr. Sturgis, of the Board of Missions, had the only series in the latter part of the convention. He delivered two remarkable addresses on

"The Study of the Church's Mission."

President Bonsall summarized the convention most clearly and effectively in his charge, and then the closing conference on "What I Have Gained" brought out many suggestions. All seemed impressed by the note of forward movement to certain victory, and the few gloomy pessimists were thought of only by contrast. Nobody could long resist the contagious spirit of triumphant determination.

The convention closed with the roan patriotic song and prayer and a short final business session. Two of our order known to have been killed in action were honored. Lay readers were heartily commended. Thanks were tendered to the Northfield Seminary authorities and more greetings were read. The convention has been invited to meet at Sewanee, but it is not at all improbable that at least four provincial gatherings will be held. If so, one must be at Northfield, for everyone who came this year will leave no stone unturned to get back and bring someone else.

To Interview Prospective Chaplains.

General Pershing's call for the best ministers the Church can give to serve as chaplains has met with a gratifying response.

The Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America is serving the churches and the government in the task of helping select chaplains.

For the convenience of those who wish to serve in this important field the Rev. Clyde F. Armitage, of the Washington office of the Federal Council, will be at the following points on the dates given:

September 19, 1918—Fort Niagara, Youngstown, N. Y., Administration Building of Y. M. C. A.

September 20, 1918—Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich., Administration Building of Y. M. C. A.

September 23, 1918—Hotel Sherman, Chicago, Ill.

October 2, 1918—Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.

October 3, 1918—Fort Benjamin Harrison, Indianapolis, Ind., Administration Building of Y. M. C. A.

October 5, 1918—Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville, Ky., headquarters of the Training School.

Arrangements for interviews may be made by writing to Mr. Armitage, 1112 Woodward Building, Washington, D. C.

News Notes of Interest.

The Richmond Clericus will reassemble after the summer recess in the Soldiers' Sailors' and Marines' Club, 505 East Grace Street, on Monday, September 9, at 10 o'clock.

The sympathies of his friends are extended to the Rev. Landon R. Mason, D. D., whose son, Lt. Randolph F. Mason, was killed in battle in France on July 20. Dr. Mason is at present in Charlottesville and has so far recovered from his painful accident of some months ago that he is able to walk around.

The Rev. Nelson P. Dame will hold a mission for the Rev. E. L. Woodward, M. D., at The Plains and at Hopewell, in Loudoun county, beginning September 8.

The Rev. Messrs. M. S. Taylor, of Berryville; Conrad H. Goodwin, of Leesburg, and Churchill J. Gibson, of Lexington, have gone to Camp Taylor, Louisville, where they are in training at the Chaplains' Training Camp.

The Rev. F. D. Goodwin, rector of Cople Parish, Westmoreland county, has made application to be admitted to the Chaplains' Training Camp.

The Rev. Jos. F. Mitchell is leaving Meade Memorial Church (colored), Alexandria, to take charge of St. Mary's Chapel (colored), Berryville, and the Rev. Lorenzo King, of Hanover, will take charge of Meade Memorial.

The Rev. R. A. Jackson, rector of St. Philip's Church (colored), Richmond, has been asked to take a chaplaincy in a colored regiment.

The churches throughout the Diocese generally have been supplied this summer, there being very few vacancies.

Pruden Parish: Pruden Parish, Pittsylvania county, the Rev. Chiswell Dabney, rector, includes three churches and three Mission Stations, all of them in the country, not even in a village; they are at cross roads and conveniently located to the majority of the community. Mr. Dabney is in Chatham, which is his own parish and in the center of this large field. He goes to one or more churches every Sunday, traveling in a Ford machine or horse and buggy. The roads are fair in summer to all of them, and impassable to most of them in the winter, except with a strong horse and buggy, and yet this noble soldier of the cross, who was a courier on General Lee's staff during the Civil War, goes through all kinds of weather ministering to these devoted parishers, who, by the way, embrace a far greater number than his community.

The real purpose of making this note is to report the series of Pruden missions which he had held this summer, and which is his custom to hold every summer. A good many of the neighboring clergy see the wonderful work Mr. Dabney is doing, the great importance of intensifying work during the summer months, going year after year to help him in the mission. As a result of these Parish Missions he has from twenty to fifty confirmed annually. The people are not raised to the customs of the Church, and, therefore, the Missional Hymnal is used altogether during the Mission and an abbreviated form of morning or evening prayer from the Prayerbook during his regular ministrations, hence the people who are possibly unable for one reason or another to follow the service join in familiar hymns and are blessed with the preaching of the gospel, and many of them partake of the Sacrament, and, therefore, the church is growing wonderfully in this rural section. And, while the membership of these various churches, as may be noted in the Church Year Book, are not very great, the people are moving to other parishes, and the writer has personal knowledge of dozens of parishes which are strengthened by communicants moving from Pruden Parish.

The Missions held this year are as follows:

St. Barnabus, near Chalk Level, the Rev. Geo. F. West, Missioner.

Grace, Museville, the Rev. Arthur Kenyon.

St. Paul's, Peytonsburg, the Rev. C. B. Bryant, D. D., Missioner.

St. John's, Mount Airy, the Rev. Jno. F. Coleman, Missioner.

Dame Memorial, Dry Fork, the Rev. G. Otis Mead, Missioner.

St. James, Roundo, the Rector, Missioner.

At the last Council of the Diocese a division of the territory embraced in Pittsylvania county was made, taking a strip from Camden and also from Bannister, making a new parish named after the Rev. C. O. Pruden, who thirty years ago went from the Seminary to Chatham, and in his own words he said after five years he considered his work done and thought seriously of moving, but then there was a prospect of opening a Mission, which he embraced and continued until he had started four, then Mr. Dabney came as his assistant; afterward the Chatham Episcopal Institute was established, which is a flourishing girls' school. Now the Rev. Mr. Kenyon is rector of Bannister and Mr. Dabney is rector of Prudent, leaving Camden, which is chiefly the city of Danville, in the hands of the Rev. Dr. J. Cleveland Hall, who has been rector for twenty-four years.

The Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson held a special confirmation at Roanoke on Tuesday, August 20, confirming two children of the Rev. Mr. Elliott Boykin, whose family are spending the summer near the city. He himself is on his vacation and temporarily supplying St. Peter's Chapel, at Roanoke.

G. O. MEADE.

The Rev. J. J. Gravatt, Jr., rector of the Church of the Church of the Ascension, Lexington, Ky., has accepted the call recently extended him to Trinity Church, Staunton, in succession to the Rev. W. Q. Hullihen, who has retired after a rectorship of forty-six years.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

Services During Summer Months:

The morning services at St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, during the absence of the rector, the Rev. R. E. L. Strider, in the month of August, have been cared for by the Rev. J. H. Garner, of Trinity Church, Moundsville, and the Rev. Frederick I. Jones, of Trinity Church, Bellaire, Ohio, the Rev. J. Logan Fish, of St. Andrew's Church, Wheeling, having the care of the early celebration on the four Sundays. No service was held in the evening. The services at St. Luke's and St. Andrew's Churches, Wheeling, have been held much as usual, with the exception of the evening service, which during the month of August was discontinued in each case. The Rev. Benjamin R. Roller has been supplying Trinity Church, Morgantown, during the summer months. The Rev. J. T. Carter (not Clarke, as was stated last week), of Christ Church, Clarksburg, has entered the regular army and is now at Camp Lee. Mr. Carter's church has granted him leave of absence during the continuation of the war. St. Matthew's Mission, Chester, is still without a rector. The Rev. J. Logan Fish will supply a service during the present month. This Mission, which hitherto has given great promise of growth, has suffered very much through services having to be discontinued.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop is spending the month of September with relatives in Virginia.

New Clergy for the Diocese: During the past three months this Diocese has received the following additions to its clergy list: The Rev. A. W. Cheatham, to Trinity Demopolis; the Rev. J. T. Ware, to St. Andrew's, Birmingham; the Rev. Richard Wilkinson, to St. John's, Montgomery.

The Laymen's Committee appointed at the last Council has received many satisfactory responses to their request for subscriptions for the support of clergymen at the State schools at Auburn and Montevallo. They are asking for $5,000.

Bishop-Coadjutor to Be Elected: The matter of the needs of a Bishop-Coadjutor is now before the parishes and missions, through the circular letter from the committee of the last Council appointed at the request of the Bishop. In this letter the committee gives a copy of the Bishop's notice of what portion of the work he will retain, which is the presidency of the Council, the receiving and ordaining of candidates for the ministry, and such other duties as agreed upon between the Coadjutor and himself, and his strength will permit. He states that it is his desire to give to the new Bishop the entire controlling voice in the matters of the Diocese, and to assist him, rather than be assisted by him. The work in this Diocese has grown rapidly, increasing in membership nearly 100 per cent. during the sixteen years of the present episcopate, though there are many places ripe for the harvest which have been touched but feebly. A special Council will be held in the late fall for the election.

The Rev. Charles K. Weller, rector of St. Peter's, Talladega, and missionary among the mountain missions of Northeast Alabama, has been called upon to take an active part in war work. He is a member of the Council of the Southeastern Department of the Y. M. C. A., chairman of the county for the "Y," a member of the County Council of Defense, and was requested to make the address at the county Memorial Day service. On Sunday, August 25th, he was called upon to open the weekly Community Singing at the Court House with a patriotic address. Mr. Weller's eldest son, though under draft age, is in the intelligence department of the 167th Infantry in France, and has recently been gassed. The last heard from him he was in Base Hospital No. 31 at Toul.

The Rev. V. G. Lowery, Secretary of the Diocese, has spent a very enjoyable vacation at a family reunion in Asheville, N. C. Mr. Lowery is the active missionary in Southeastern Alabama.

The reports of the General Board of Missions show the effect of the visit of the Rev. L. G. Woods to the churches in southern part of the Diocese. Mr. Woods has a happy way of telling congregations of the Church's mission.

The clergy at Birmingham, Florence and Mobile are having very strenuous duties added by the presence of the great war industries in their midst. At Florence, where the great Muscle Shoals nitrate plant is located, the population has increased some 300 per cent. ---

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

SOCIAL SERVICE DEFINED.

We are glad to see that the Synod of the Province of the Mid-West has announced a definition of Christian Social Service, which is so clear and emphatic that we quote it in full:

Definition: The highest form of Christian Social Service is the establishment of Social Justice, that is to say, of a condition of life wherein the fruits of industry shall be so distributed that every human being shall have a chance to live a full human life, with due opportunity for the preservation of bodily health, the cultivation of mental powers and the exercise of spiritual faculties; and no merely ameliorative or charitable activities can ever take the place of this fundamental duty.

Principles of Social Justice for Today:

1. Application of the accepted truth of Christian Ethics that wealth must be held as a trust from God for the welfare of humanity.
2. A living wage as the minimum for every worker.
3. The advisability of establishing some adequate method of insurance against unemployment.
4. The protection of all workers from dangerous machinery, occupational diseases, excessive fatigue and premature mortality.
5. The right of employers and employees to organize for the advancement of their interests, with due regard to the right of the community to be considered a third party in industrial adjustments.
6. The recognition of "collective bargaining" as a method advantageous, under present conditions, for the promotion of industrial peace.
7. One day's rest in seven as a right for every human being.
8. Such organization of the means of recreation as will promote the best use of leisure time.
9. The fullest possible development for every child, especially by provision of adequate education.
10. The abolition of labor for children under sixteen years of age.
11. Such regulation of the conditions of toil for women workers as shall protect and conserve morality and the health of the coming generation.
12. Suitable provision for the care of those incapacitated for labor by age or by injury in employment.
13. Such control of the liquor traffic as shall protect the individual and the community from the economic, social and moral waste of that traffic.

The foregoing should attract special interest during the week in which we have celebrated Labor Day.

We should not forget that Christianity was founded by One Who in His earthly life was a carpenter, and Whose immediate followers were all working men.

For this reason the statement of war aims, as put forth by the British labor party in its recent pamphlet, should be of special interest to the Church. In its wording these aims correspond so closely with the above definition of Social Service, as adopted by an important organization of our Church, that we quote them in part herewith, so that readers may appreciate how nearly identical are those things for which the Mid-West Synod stands and which the Labor Party of England demands.

The latter says: "We demand and mean to secure proper legislative provision against unemployment, accident, and industrial disease, a reasonable amount of leisure, a minimum rate of wages. We shall insist upon a large and practicable scheme to protect the whole wage-earning class against the danger of unemployment and reduction of wages, with a consequent degradation of the standard of life, when the war ends, and the forces are demobilized and the munition factories cease to work. . . . What the workers want is freedom, a definite elevation of their status, the abolition of the system of wage-slavery which destroyed their independence and made freedom in any real sense impossible. We believe that the path to the democratic control of industry lies in the common ownership of the means of production, and we shall strenuously resist every proposal to hand back to private capitalists the great industries and services that have come under government control during the war. . . . Direct taxation, we hold, upon large incomes and private fortunes is the method by which the greater part of the necessary revenue should be raised; we advocate the retention in some appropriate form of the excess profits tax. . . . We seek to prevent by methods of common ownership and of taxation the accumulation of great fortunes in private hands. Instead of senseless individual extravagance we desire to see the wealth of the nation expended for social purposes—for the constant improvement and increase of the nation's enterprises, to make provision for the sick, the aged, the infirm, to establish a genuine national system of education, to provide the means of public improvement in all directions by which the happiness and health of the people will be ensured."

A prominent Bishop of the Church once said: "It is time for the Church to cease to be the almoner of the rich and become the champion of the poor." From the quotations above it would seem that the Synod of the Province of the Mid-West has recognized the truth of this statement and is acting upon it.

UNITY.

With a great coal famine staring us in the face, it is not too early for churches to begin to consider the possibility of fuel conservation by means of having congregations unite for their evening services.

This plan was most successfully adopted last year in many of our cities, but was not put into operation until after Christmas. It usually requires meetings of vestries or official boards, and more or less negotiation among the clergy, and for this reason we think steps should be taken now looking to such arrangements.

In this connection we are informed by the Religious Publicity Service of the Federal Council of Churches that in the State of Vermont co-operative efforts amongst different churches have progressed a good deal beyond merely combining for one service a Sunday. We are told that no less than eighteen federations have been formed for more effective Church work, into which three Church organizations have entered. We give the results obtained, as given to us:

One of the methods employed in seven of the cases was the exchange of fields. In one instance there has been permanent and complete withdrawal, the Congregational house of worship will be repaired with the proceeds of the sale of the Congregational parsonage and placed at the disposal of the United Church, and the Methodist house of worship will be changed over into a community house. Two other towns are illustrations of what union arrangements can bring about in the way of securing stronger men and increase of salary. In the first each church has been paying $800 to its minister and had received only passable service. Now the minister is paid $1,200 and he is reputed to be one of the stronger men in the Methodist Conference. In the second, the one minister was receiving $900 and the other about $600. Now the minister of the United Church is receiving $1,200 and is an unusually competent community minister. A marked increase in attendance at these united churches has been noted.

Federation, the other method employed, means that nothing is said about the withdrawal of either denomination, and in the agreement the suggestion is that there may be an alternation of ministers between the denominations. It is not unlikely that some of these federations will lead to the withdrawal of one or the other denominations.

The Greatest Gift.

Man must go to God to get a right idea of life. He cannot get it from his own reason nor from the world's philosophy. Life is infinitely more than existence; it is existence with a moral quality. "In the Bible," says Dr. Griffith Thomas, "life always means union." Physical life is union of soul and body. Spiritual life is union of soul and God. And eternal life is union of soul and body with God forever. The great painter, George Frederic Watts, who was a Christian, had a true conception of life as expressed in his motto, "The utmost for the highest." Paul put it in this way: "For me to live is Christ." Life is "the greatest thing in the world," the utmost that man can have; and Christ is "the highest." A life lived in this ideal begins in faith and is continued in faithfulness. This "utmost" of ours is committed to us moment by moment. We may well conceive of it as does a veteran Christian who recently wrote to a friend, "I live only one day at a time, and ask God to live it in me."—Sunday School Times.

The firmest friendships have been formed in mutual adversity, as iron is most strongly united by the fiercest flame.—Colton.

Fifteenth Sunday After Trinity: Continuing the explanation of Old Testament Scriptures employed in the morning historical course during the latter part of second year, Isaiah 56, 57, 58 and 59, ethical instructions given after the Return, or at least for the period after the Return, are inserted here and followed in Malachi which prophet "gives the moral judgment of God on the remnant restored by His grace under Ezra and Nehemiah," and prophecies of "the day of the Lord" (so different from "der tag").

The first Sunday morning selection is still timely with its message to those who are not even perplexed over the "taking away of righteous and merciful men," or to those who are "wearied with the length of the way"; and with its promise of peace (but not to the wicked) and of the Presence of the Most High, not with the proud and arrogant, but the humble and contrite.

The second lesson, while correlated in a general way with the first, being also a message to the Church redeemed, was selected mainly on account of the topic of the Collect: the Church and salvation. Almost always the Apostle Paul speaks of salvation as the result of a process, not as completed. In their present estate men are "being saved" or "being lost." Note especially Romans 5:10 (in Saturday morning's lesson), where reconciliation (effected through the death of our Lord) is expressly distinguished from salvation, the latter future and through the life, that is, the imparted risen life, of the glorified Christ. In Ephesians, however, salvation is spoken of as accomplished. Twice he asserts, "By grace have ye been saved" (Rev. Ver.). God has also raised us up with Christ and made us to sit in heavenly places with Him. And if fanatics have interpreted it as though there were no human side to the work of being saved and no possibility of the believer's being ever lost, it is to be feared that Churchmen have too much overlooked it altogether. If it needs to be balanced by many other passages, such as, e. g., "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling," it is yet an open door to a present heaven.

The Collect, Epistle and Gospel for this Sunday are a departure from the general plan, by which truth spoken or deeds done by Christ in the days of His flesh are, through the power of the Spirit, made effective in the experience of the author of the Epistle and made also the subject of prayer in the Collect. In this case three separate strands are woven together: the Cross, the Kingdom of God and the Church. The New Testament morning lesson, then, being related to the Church, the evening one matches the glory of the Cross; or, rather, reveals first the glory of the Cross ("now is the Son of man glorified") and urges the sacrificial life upon His followers. The Old Testament selection, same as that of Prayer Book lesson for twentieth Sunday after Trinity, but shortened, urges that choice between Baal and Jehovah which in the Christian dispensation becomes the "seek first the Kingdom" of the Gospel; while Ahab's protest against the prophet's troublesome truth looks forward to Judas' method of simplifying things by getting rid of the Christ and is the voice in all of us of that flesh which must needs be crucified.

Review.

1. Why was Jesus so pleased with the Centurion in Capernaum? Matt. 8:10, 13.
2. What loving invitation did Jesus give? Matt. 11:28-30.
3. Where is it found in our Prayer Book?
4. What mercy did Jesus particularly love to give? Luke 7:17, 18.
5. How did the Homeless Man live? Matt. 8:20; Luke 8:3.
6. How astonished were the disciples at Christ's power over nature? Mark 4:41.
7. What did Jesus do on His third journey through Galilee? Matt. 9:35.
8. What prayer did Jesus give us for Missions? Matt. 9:38.
9. Where is it found in our Prayer Book?
10. When the Jews left Christ, what did His disciples say? Jno. 6:68, 69.
11. Which receives your first care, your soul or your body? Matt. 6:33.

Note: The six lessons' included in this Review describe our Lord's Life during the summer of the year 28 A. D. to the spring of 29, inclusive. These months, spent wholly in Galilee, included two Missionary journeys among its villages; with His headquarters in Capernaum; also the enlargement of His work by calling and sending the Twelve. It ends with His second rejection by the Jews, though the period of His greatest popularity, because He would not let them make Him a temporal King over them, but preached the spiritual nature of His Kingdom.

ceptions under which man's feeble apprehension sinks, and emotions too big for human heart to hold. Even in our earthly experience there have been occasions in which great and sudden lapses of feeling—the joy, for instance, of unexpected meetings with lost or long-absent friends, or the thrilling sense of escape from seemingly inevitable danger or death have proved too much for the heart's capacity of emotion, and the weight of rapture has broken the cup which it filled. Indeed, it is just because the greatest minds approach most nearly the limits of human reason, and converse with thoughts which strain by their grandeur the very largest capacity of thinking, that great wit is, proverbially, to madness near allied. But all thoughts, all emotions, possible to man on earth, make but slight demand upon his powers compared with those which, were the barriers thrown down that now shut out God and eternity, would come rushing in upon the soul! What mind, what heart, would be able to endure such august revelation?—John Caird.

How Is Christ "Unveiled" in Us?

What the Lord Jesus Christ would like if He lived on earth today, the world should be able to tell by observing the everyday conduct of His followers. Would a description of our daily doings turn one's thought instantly to the Master? That was the effect upon some Christians recently when a friend who had worked in China with Hudson Taylor told some intimate stories of the great missionary; how he went to every length in caring thoughtfully for the needs of others, never considering self. And with all his greatness he was so simple that an old-time friend naturally ended his relation of these incidents with the word: "He was truly the servant of all." One of the listeners observed: "He just reminds you of the Lord Jesus, and if we should have the Master come in and talk with us now I believe one of the most surprising things to us would be His simplicity and naturalness." Christ's living in us is not a figure of speech, but a literal reality!—Sunday School Times.

The most essential element in Christianity is its conception of a human God—of a God, in the first place, not apart from the universe, not outside of it and distinct from it, but immanent in it; yet not immanent only, but actually incarnate and revealed in the Incarnation.—Selected.

NANCY BYRD TURNER, Editor

For the Southern Churchman. A Common Dawn.

Nancy Byrd Turner.

It was only a common sunrise, dawn of a common day,
When over the brooding mountains the silent dark turned gray,

Slowly, ever so slowly, until the skyline stood
Traced, in a curve of hilltop, a scallop of winding wood;

But a faint wind breathed from the southward, a small bird crooned in a tree,
And pearl and agate and amber softly began to be;

A wise cock crowed in the distance, a comrade answered him,
A spire down in the valley pointed a finger slim.

Amethyst, rose and opal, beryl and topaz came—
Crystal that deepened to crimson, and turned to a living flame,

Till all the hills took fire, and splendor caught the wood,
And every field and meadow was filled with a shining flood.

A bare tree, gray and blasted, burned like the Bush of old,
An ancient roadside ruin was washed in limpid gold;

Fair from a slender chimney a mounting smoke-wreath curled,
And down in the misty marshes a black-bird sang to the world.

It was only a common sunrise, dawn of a common day,
But it etched itself on the ages, and it will not pass away.

And I thought of the Holy City, and I said with humble lips,
Lo, every few brief hours earth hath Apocalypse!

Man cannot choose an acre whereon he may abide,
But what, come break of morning, it is all glorified;

He cannot raise one roof-tree that sunrise does not bless,
Nor fashion one small window that frames no loveliness.

Nay, if he be not blinded, beyond each common night
A miracle must open upon his human sight;

If his heart be not holden, his spirit will put on
As though it were a garment the marvel of the dawn.

So he will go forth girded into the common day,
Somehow aware, of wonder beside him in the way.

Yea, whereso'er he follows along the common sod
Faithful shall walk beside him the beauty that is God!

What Courage Is.

The "stuff" that soldiers are made of is described in the following extract from an article by Lieutenant Leon Archibald in the current Good House-keeping. This Canadian officer enlisted at the beginning of the war, was wounded at Ypres, fought at Armentieres, Loos and the Somme, and is now at home recovering from wounds. He writes:

"Winter certainly measured out its full quota of hardships for us. On account of the impassable condition of communication trenches, our journeyings to and from the front line were reserved for the darkness. This condition increased our difficulties materially. The wounded, for instance, were almost invariably forced to remain in a cold, dirty and water-logged trench until darkness arrived to obscure their passage out. One day, however, in order to give a badly wounded boy the benefit of his one chance in ten thousand that he had to recover, two of his chums decided to make the attempt to get him out in daylight to a dressing station. Stretchers could not be used on account of the sharp turns and narrowness of the trench, so the boy was placed on his rubber sheet, the two bearers grasping each of the four corners. The wounded chap's leg had been badly shattered above the knee, while his left arm and side had been liberally dosed with shrapnel. He was a large fellow, and the going was bad. Every few yards, owing to obstacles or to the fatigue of the bearers, it was necessary to put down the improvised stretcher, when the occupant's body from his shoulders downward would immediately sink out of sight into cold, soupy muck. Just what that boy suffered and just how many times a minute he died is not difficult to imagine, but we never heard a murmur.

"Arriving at the junction of the trench and a hedge, the little party laboriously climbed out and still more laboriously bore their comrade back to the expert attention which finally saved his life. No finer demonstration of self-sacrifice have I ever seen than the exhibition of this wounded boy's two chums. They openly courted disaster every inch of that seven hundred yards back to the dressing station, and in the end their sterling courage and indomitable perseverance were crowned by success. I heard a senior officer remark on seeing the pitiful little procession go down the trench, 'That sort of thing will never learn the bitter taste of defeat, for it will never know when it's beaten.'

"It was this same indescribable 'stuff' for which I saw a little lance corporal receive a V. C. not many days later. The award, like many such, was posthumous. During a period of great stress this little chap, with his arm literally torn out by the roots, kept circulating among his men, encouraging them and using them to their best advantage. He died two hours later from loss of blood, still on the job when he could have sought the aid that might have kept him alive."

A Rise in Flour.

"Good-by, mother; I'm off for cooking-class!" Beth opened the front door and edged through it with caution, to humor her oddly shaped bundle. "Confess," she added, "that you have a very resourceful daughter; it isn't every one who would think of taking this bowl of 'sponge' along, to satisfy little Sarah Finkelstein's longing to bake raised biscuits. She's been wild about it ever since I showed her about the mixing last week."

"A bright idea," mother agreed; "but I'm glad you haven't a very long ride to the settlement this warm afternoon, for your bowl is small and the yeast is good and lively. Good-by, dear—I put the little clock in your hand-bag as you suggested. Success to the biscuits!" Her eyes followed the trim young figure for a moment with motherly pride before she closed the door. Beth was a good girl; a trifle hasty and short-sighted sometimes, but so full of helpful impulses.

The young assistant teacher returned earlier than usual. To her mother's surprised comment she vouchsafed no reply at first, though a certain tension in her manner suggested that something had gone amiss. Mother cannily bided her time, and after tea, in the cool darkness of the porch, the story came out.

"You're a tactful old darling, mumsie, not to ask questions, for I know you're dying to hear about those biscuits. Well, all went smoothly until I got about half-way there, and then the cars were blocked—a fire ahead, or something. The conductor didn't think it would be long, so I sat patiently for five minutes, and then sat patiently for goodness knows how long, until—yes, you know what's coming—that horrid dough began to rise! At first it just puffed up a little, so I fixed the napkin and paper and held them as tightly as I could. I knew that if I got out and walked the rest of the way, I'd surely have trouble, and be too late for class besides; and while there was a chance of starting, I didn't want to give up and come home.

"But the car didn't start. It stood and stood, and that stuff riz and riz, and finally began to run over and ooze out into my lap through the cracks of my neat but skimpy little paper. Such a beautiful demonstration of the power of yeast; but I was too busy scolding myself for not taking your advice, and a larger bowl to appreciate the scientific side! Then a nice old gentleman next to me grasped the situation, and, just before he got off, spread his newspaper on my lap, with a Sir Walter Raleigh air; but the busy little sponge kept on working, and soon had me all messed up again, and people began to sit up and take notice, and to look at me as though I was crazy to carry such a thing in the cars.

"I felt more and more confused and awkward, and finally dropped my bag, clock and all, and something hit the jigger that started the spasmodic alarm, which began to go off every fifteen seconds—and me with both hands full, my new black silk gloves all dough, and my face hot enough to bake a hundred biscuits! Everybody was smiling except a young workman, who picked up the bag most respectfully, and he was evidently trying hard not to smile. It was too much for me, and, after thanking him, I mustered what dignity I could and disembarked, with the invisible clock still performing frantically."

"You poor child!" Mother's eyes were full of mirthful tears. "What next?"

"I waited a few minutes for a home car; set down the bowl long enough to intimidate and suppress that alarm, gathered up the bowl, waited some more and finally realized that the block had stopped the westbound car too, and started to walk home. I marched up the avenue, trying to look unconscious, and keeping step to 'Tipperary,' which was going round and round in my head like a phonograph record; and it was a long, long way to go, I tell you! When I got past the store section I watched for a vacant lot, and then I cruelly abandoned my infant Vesuvius—it was cracked, anyhow, mumsie, and I'll get you another. I only hope the thing hasn't gone on overflowing the neighborhood, like the porridge-mill in the fairy tale! Then I went into a drug store telephoned to the cooking-school, got a soda with my last nickel, trudged home—and that's all!"

"Well," mother commented with a twinkle, "you are in a position to confirm the reports of the rise in flour."

Beth gave her an appreciative hug. "Bless you! It isn't every parent who would be content to adorn the tale that way, with such a chance to point a moral instead!"—Corrinne Rockwell Swain.

Straight Traffic.

"Father," said Ernest, as he rode downtown in New Haven beside Dr. Benton in the automobile, "why are you always laying so much emphasis upon habits? I think you're asking me to take a pretty long look ahead. Shouldn't a fellow have a few years in which he can be care free? It doesn't seem to me that a young fellow should take life as seriously as you are trying to make me take it. I want to have my four years in college care free, without everlastingly thinking of consequences. If I need to, I can turn over a new leaf when I get through college."

As Ernest finished his protest they were just approaching the corner of Chapel and Church Streets. About twenty-five feet from the corner they passed a traffic sign post that read, "Straight Traffic at Next Corner."

"What does that sign mean?" asked the doctor, for he was from out of town and had not seen it before.

"It means," said his son, "that now you've passed that post you have to go straight ahead. You can't stop, and you can't turn."

"Well, I guess," said the doctor, as his machine shot out of the traffic into the open street ahead, "that's as good an illustration as I need. Ernest, I've been practicing medicine long enough to have seen a good many sides of life, and the more I see of it the more I'm convinced that it's pretty much like that traffic post—once you get beyond a certain point with some things there's no stopping. You simply have to go right through. The drink habit or the drug habit is an example. I don't suppose anyone who started out with a friendly glass now and then thought he was going to end with delirium tremens. But before he knew it, he ran by the last point of recovery, just as I ran by that sign post, and after that it was 'straight traffic at the next corner' for him."

"It reminds me of one time when I took the wrong train at New York. I wanted to get off at Norwalk, but I'd got on a through express to New Haven, and to New Haven I went. First you take the train; then the train takes you. The time to do your thinking about your destination is before you take the train. You say you don't want to be everlastingly thinking of consequences while you're in college. Well, it's because I don't want you to have to think everlastingly about consequences after you get out of college that I am warning you to be careful now. The turning over a new leaf idea is a snare laid by the devil. What you've written by habit in your nervous system is written, and it's always there either as an ally or as an enemy. Don't run past the sign posts, and then expect nature to reverse the traffic regulations for your benefit. Beyond a certain point it's 'straight traffic at the next corner' for us all."—Youth's Companion.

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

XII. Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus.

This may be rightly called the great American Sunday-school hymn. In every church of almost every denomination its stirring challenge has rung forth Sunday after Sunday for so long that we have come to associate the song intimately in our minds with the sound of far-carrying young voices and the look of upturned young faces. There is not a line in a single stanza that the smallest child cannot understand.

The origin of the poem holds a particular interest for Southerners. The lines were directly inspired by the dying words of a young clergyman, Dudley Atkins Tyng, who first saw the light of day in a quiet rectory in Prince George's County, Maryland, where his father, the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, was minister-in-charge. Dudley Tyng passed his boyhood in Philadelphia. He was a precocious scholar, reading the Latin authors when he was only seven, and entering the University of Pennsylvania at fourteen. At a very early age he consecrated his heart and his talents to God. After he became rector of the Church of the Epiphany in Philadelphia he threw himself with loving ardor into the great religious awakening which about that time spread through the principal cities of the land. He was the favorite leader of the great union prayer meetings held in his own town.

In the spring following the wonderful awakening he met with a terrible accident. "Doctor," the young minister asked, "must I die?"

When the physician bowed his head, the young man said to him, "Then I have something to tell you. I have loved you as a friend; I long to love you now as a brother in Christ."

He was asked if he had any message for his brothers in the ministry, and it was then that he uttered unconsciously the refrain of the great hymn born of that hour—"Tell them," he said, "to stand up for Jesus."

George Duffield, a Presbyterian clergyman of Detroit, inspired by the message, wrote "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus," as a hymn to be sung after the sermon he was to deliver at the young clergyman's funeral. Dudley Tyng was buried, his biographer says, amid the tears of more than ten thousand people, and beside his grave the hymn that he had inspired was heard for the first time.

Stand up, stand up for Jesus,
Ye soldiers of the cross!
Lift high His royal banner!
It must not suffer loss;
From victory unto victory

His army shall He lead,
Till every foe is vanquished
And Christ is Lord indeed.

Stand up, stand up for Jesus!
The trumpet call obey!
Forth to the mighty conflict
In this His glorious day!
Ye that are men now serve Him
Against unnumbered foes!
Let courage mount with danger,
And strength to strength oppose.

Stand up, stand up for Jesus!
Stand in His strength alone!
The arm of flesh will fail you,
Ye dare not trust your own:
Put on the gospel armor,
And watching unto prayer,
When duty calls, or danger,
Be never wanting there!

Stand up, stand up for Jesus!
The strife will not be long:
This day, the noise of battle,
The next, the victor's song.
To him that overcometh,
A crown of life shall be;
He with the King of glory
Shall reign eternally.

WAR ECONOMY CORNER.

Let the Sun Do Your Drying.

Sun-drying has much to recommend it, as there is no expenditure of fuel and no danger of the fruits and vegetables becoming overheated. An inexpensive tray may be made at home. Make an oblong frame, 36 inches long and 18 inches wide, of four strips of wood, one and one-half inches wide, and one-half inch thick. Galvanized wire netting of one-half inch mesh may be stretched across the bottom of the frame and fastened with small staples. Or laths one-eighth inch apart may be secured across the bottom of the frame. If the trays are made of uniform size, they may be stacked one on top of the other and protected from the rain by canvas. Only bright, sunny days should be chosen for sun-drying, as rain and dew cause the products to decay. Place the trays between chairs, or on kegs, to allow a complete circulation of air under and above the fruits. Place cheese-cloth on the trays before laying on the fruit. To prevent flies and mosquitoes from touching the fruit, a covering of cheese-cloth should be placed over the fruit, supported so that it will not rest directly on the food. Once or twice during the day the vegetables or fruits should be turned so that the moisture can be evaporated evenly.

After the products have dried the required length of time, the "conditioning" stage follows. This is perhaps the most important stage of the process of drying. Place the product in paper bags, boxes or cartons. Once a day for three or four days pour the products from one box to another, so as to give the whole mass of vegetables and fruit an even degree of moisture. If it is found that any of the products are not completely dry, they should be returned to the drier again.

With the conditioning stage completed, the vegetables are stored away. Glass jars, paper bags, tin cans, pasteboard boxes, or paraffin cartons make excellent receptacles for the dry products. Any receptacle which protects the product from moisture and mold is satisfactory. It proves convenient to pack sufficient vegetable or fruit for two or three meals in each bag. Dry products should be stored in a cool, dry, well-ventilated place.—Dorothy B. Marsh, in Good Housekeeping.

Till Evening Time.

Light of the Years!
The way is all unknown—
Make plain my path to me,
Give me a faith serene—
The end I cannot see!
Deepen my trust! Brighten my hope!
Ere comes the evening time—
O Light of the Years!

Light of the Years!
Give me a work to do—
A life in service spent!
If mine but humble part,
Give me a soul content!
Sweeten my heart! Dispel my pride!
Ere comes the evening time—
O Light of the Years!

Light of the Years!
Give me a vision clear
To see and know the right!
A courage that is strong
To do it with my might!
Quicken my powers! Enlarge my mind!
Ere comes the evening time—
O Light of the Years!
Light of the Years!
In midst of Life's hard fight,
And its strife and stress,
When burdened oft with care,
Thy presence soothes distress—
Strengthens my soul and nerves my will
To toil till evening time—
O Light of the Years!

The Good Samaritan of Today.

Few people realize the extent to which the Travelers' Aid Society is practicing the teaching of this most familiar and helpful parable of the Saviour. This clipping shows strikingly what is being done and is well worth reading:

Two million persons assisted in difficulties arising out of the wartime emergencies of travel will probably be the record of the Travelers' Aid Society for 1918, according to National Secretary Orin C. Baker. The total number helped last year was 750,000, when the volume of travel was considerably less than during the present year and the society's facilities not so extensive. There are now 175 organizations doing such work throughout the United States, and reports received from only seventy-five of these for the first six months of 1918 show a total of 342,124 persons assisted.

While the society has in the past devoted its efforts largely to furnishing moral protection to travelers, especially women and girls who are unaccompanied, Mr. Baker said that since the beginning of the war the society has found it necessary to broaden its activities to include munitions centres and war camps. Women workers are assisted in getting located in suitable homes, and are offered the friendship and counsel of the organization's trained workers. This service is extended to the families of the men workers whose women folk follow them to new places of employment.

A high aim is more than a minister of power. It is a gracious means of illumination which, like the headlights on a car, throws its beams on the road that stretches before us. A high aim is a means of provision; and when the mark is Christ it endows the soul with the rich and companionable powers of sight, and insight, and foresight. A high aim is perhaps not so much light as sight; with the high aim of the Apostle Paul we look at everything through the very eyes of the Lord.—J. H. Jowett.

Ten Little Worries.

N. B. T.

Ten little worries a little girl knew—
And every single one of them was useless, too!

One little worry feared the sun wouldn't shine,
But the clouds proved to be just fog, and then there were nine.

One worry made a fuss about the garden's fate,
But a busy hoe was set to work, and then there were eight.

One couldn't find, at first, a fourth of eleven,
But presently the answer came, and then there were seven.

One, when she painted, feared that colors wouldn't mix,
But blue and green made yellow, and then there were six.

One made her tremble to see a storm arrive,
But the lightning didn't touch her, and then there were five.

One worry fretted about a creaking door,
But a drop of oil worked wonders, and then there were four.

One worry warned her to scream about a bee,
But the buzzer flew into a rose, and then there were three.

One whispered softly that she had a lot to do,
But she hurried up and did it, and then there were two.

One worry whimpered about the setting sun,
But soon a silver moon came up, and then there was one.

One feared that bedtime would put an end to fun,
But a dream came and frolicked, and then there was none.

Ten little worries that brief day brought,
And not a single one of them was worth a thought.

Freddy's First Rescue.

Freddy May was big for his age, wearing a seven-year suit on a six-year-old body. But he thought he was older, much older than he was, and big—well, wasn't he almost as big as his father? At least he would be some day, and meanwhile he was growing.

The May family—father, mother and Freddy, six years old, going on seven—lived on a rock in the middle of the ocean or at least five miles away from any other land. There was a tall lighthouse on the rock, and at the base of its tower was a tiny house with five rooms. This house was home, the only home Freddy ever knew.

The lighting of the great lamp of the lighthouse had always been a great attraction to Freddy. One day, when his father carried him up, up the winding stairs, and showed him how the lamp was lighted and how its rays spread far out over the tossing ocean, Freddy felt that his little world was the most wonderful that anybody could imagine. Think of the hundred steps up the tall tower and the magnificent view from the top!

But as time added another year to Freddy's age, his little mind soared to greater achievements. He was accustomed to storms and rough weather. He knew that his father often went out in his little boat to help strange people who drifted near the shoals. Sometimes he brought them back in his boat half dead and so white! His mother then worked hard to give them warm clothing and hot things to drink and eat.

Freddy at first was content to watch and help; then he wanted to do more. He wanted to go with his father in the lifeboat to pick up the shipwrecked people.

"Some day, lad, when you get bigger," his father answered this request.

After that Freddy asked every little while: "Am I big enough now to go with you in the boat, papa?"

"Not yet, not quite yet," had always been the response.

So Freddy had been forced to wait and grow. How he counted the days and looked at his figure in the glass to see if he was growing! When he first donned his seven-year suit, he felt surely that he was almost big enough to help save shipwrecked people. As chance would have it, his opportunity did come a few days after this important event. There had been a storm at sea, not a very heavy storm, but one which made the sea pretty rough off the shoals. The day after the storm the sun came up bright and warm. The sea was rolling in long swells. Not a mile away from the lighthouse something was drifting heavily, swinging slowly up and down with the waves. A quick glance through the telescope showed that it was a dismantled sloop, a small coasting vessel, abandoned by its crew.

Mr. May quickly got his boat into the water and was preparing to go to the derelict when Freddy's lips faltered: "Papa, I am big enough to go."

There was a smile on the light-keeper's lips; and after glancing up at the weather and down at the sea, he said:

"Yes, Freddy, you can go to-day: jump in the stern."

Now there was no happier boy in all the world than Freddy May at that moment. He fairly tumbled down the steps and dropped snugly into the stern of the lifeboat. His eyes were bright and glowing. Wasn't he going to a real wreck?

The row to the dismantled sloop was not a long or rough one, and Mr. May pulled so lustily at his oars that they were alongside in no time. When they reached the sloop, Freddy gazed at it in awe. Would there be half-drowned people aboard, and would he be strong enough to help his father lift them into the lifeboat?

"Now, boy, you stay quietly in the stern until I come back," cautioned his father.

He tied the boat to the stern of the sloop and then nimbly climbed aboard. He was gone a long time, so long that Freddy got worried. What would he do if anything happened to his father? Could he row back to the lighthouse? What if another storm should come up and make the ocean very rough?

He was thinking of such dreadful things when Mr. May appeared above and shouted: "Nobody aboard, Freddy. She's been deserted for a long time. We'll go back home now."

This announcement was not pleasant for our little mariner. What a disappointment to go to a shipwreck and then find nobody and not even go aboard the wreck!

"But, papa, there might be somebody in—it!"

His father shook his head. "No, lad, I've been everywhere." Then noticing the disappointment on the little face, he added: "But if you want to come aboard and look, I'll let you. I forgot this was your first shipwreck. Here, now, hold fast to my hand, and I'll pull you up."

Freddy climbed up, with his father's assistance, almost as easily as a veteran sailor. He stood on the deck of the old, abandoned sloop a moment. One glance showed him the awful desolation of the wave-swept craft. Mast, spars, sail and rigging were tumbled about in a confused mass, and part of the cargo of lumber was shifted over to one side.

"Be careful, little man, and hold tight to my hand," his father cautioned. "I'll take you to the cabin and show you what an abandoned boat looks like."

Freddy seemed to come naturally into the use of his little sea legs. He did not lurch and roll with each toss of the boat, but walked steadily forward. When they came to the cabin, Mr. May threw open the door and—

Suddenly both of them started. Something moved inside, and then there was a wild cry of some frightened animal. Out of the darkness a bundle of white appeared. It came directly toward Freddy and mewed. "It's a pussycat, papa, a white pussycat!"

Freddy took the frightened creature in his arms and stroked its soft fur. The kitten mewed and rubbed its nose in his face.

"Do you suppose it belongs to somebody, papa?" asked Freddy anxiously.

"It belongs to you, little man, if to any one. You rescued him, and I don't think anybody will take it away from you."

All the way back to the lighthouse home Freddy held the kitten in his arms and stroked and patted its head. In his affection for the shipwrecked cat he even forgot to notice the waves or the condition of the weather. The one fact to impress his mind was that he had made his first rescue from a shipwreck, and he would always keep the kitten for his own. He wanted a playmate—a kitten or a dog—and now the sea had brought him one all for his own self.—Selected.

How Dorothy Got Even.

"I'll get even with Richard," sobbed Dorothy, running to the pump to rinse her mouth with fresh, cool water. "He's horrid, and I'll never play with him any more."

"Why, what is the matter?" asked Mrs. Bliss in alarm. Dorothy and Richard were cousins and the best of friends, so the sudden outburst could hardly be accounted for. Everyone said that the children played so happily together always, and here was

Dorothy declaring that she would never play with him again. "What has Richard done?"

"He put a box of horrid candy in the postoffice," sobbed the little girl, spitting and sputtering. "Maybe he'll call it a joke, but I won't play with him."

Mrs. Bliss examined the pretty little box her daughter handed to her. It had a dozen or more small pink candles, Dorothy said, when she opened it at the big old tree they called the post-office, and she had put two of them in her mouth. They were filled with nasty stuff; so she had hurried to the pump to get the taste out of her mouth.

"And I gave him a box of the nicest fudge yesterday," said Dorothy, wiping her eyes. "You just wait. I'll get even with him. See if I don't."

"How do you think you will get even?" asked Mrs. Bliss, never once saying that it was naughty to want revenge.

"I'll put something nasty in the box for him," said Dorothy. "O mamma. I know what I'll do. I'll get some of those big ugly thistles in the lane and stuff them in out of sight, so when he reaches down into the hole he'll hurt his fingers just awful. I'll give him something to think about when he tries to play a joke on me next time."

"I suppose that will make him think twice the next time," said Mrs. Bliss. "Richard has those sore fingers from eczema and the thistles will scratch him hard when he puts his hand in."

Somehow Dorothy would rather have had her mother tell her that it was wrong to get even, but Mrs. Bliss went on planning ways of hurting Richard. Dorothy slipped off her lap and went away to get the sickle to cut the thistles, while her mother went on with her work; but the morning was not a very happy one. The postoffice was a little secret shared only by the two mothers and the two children, and it held something every day for each child. Once Richard had put a kitten in it for Dorothy, and once she had responded with a dear little puppy; but usually the gifts were little things like candy and fruit. The postoffice was a hollow in the big oak by the bars, and it was understood that the morning was the time for Dorothy to get the America must grow more wheat. Upon the yields we get from the soil depends the victory we must wrest from the Hun.

How can the farmer, who is short of labor, grow more grain? He cannot do it by increasing his acreage, for that requires more labor! Increased production is best attained when every working hour is employed on fertilized land. Fertilizer increases the grain crop—without the hiring of an extra man—the purchase of extra machinery—or the use of extra power.

At the Ohio Experiment Station, tests were made on growing wheat with fertilizer, and without it. When planted on unfertilized land, it required 25 acres to produce 340 bushels. The total cost (including seed, labor and land rental) was $280, or 82c per bu.

V-C Fertilizers

When planted on fertilized land, it required only 10 acres to produce 340 bu. The total cost (including seed, labor, land rental and fertilizer) was $182, or 53c per bu.

In other words, by using fertilizer, the cost of producing a bushel was lessened 29c—or that much more profit was made. Less than half as much land was needed.

With labor at present wages, the saving is even greater than shown in these tests. Many farmers get an increase of 7 to 8 bushels of wheat per acre from the application of only 200 lbs. of V-C Fertilizers. Use V-C Fertilizers. They contain the plant-foods necessary to make good strong straw and fill out the pods of grain. They insure more bushels in payment for every hour of labor—more profit on every bushel you sell.

Our 50 factories and distributing points enable us to ship with a minimum amount of transportation, but due to the scarcity of materials and freight cars, fertilizers should be ordered immediately. Write for name of V-C Dealers near you mail and the afternoon Richard's time. Dorothy gathered the ugliest thistles she could find and was about to start for the box when the thoughts that she had been thinking for the past hour sent her to the kitchen. "Mamma, is it wrong to get even?" she asked soberly.

"Yes, dear," said the mother. "You know it is wrong."

"Then I'll not put the thistles in the postoffice. I'll get that pretty marble I found last week and put it in for Richard."

"I think that will be better," said Mrs. Bliss. "If Richard only meant it for a joke, it would be too bad to spoil the little postoffice with thistles."

So the pretty marble was well wrapped and placed in the postoffice, and all afternoon the little girl waited for Richard to come over. But the shadows were gathering, and still he did not come. Old Mrs. Parker told the reason why when she stopped in a few minutes that evening on her way home.

"The oddest thing happened to me to-day, Mrs. Bliss," said Mrs. Parker. "Yesterday I was going down your lane on my way to my daughter's, when a hard rain came up. I saw I was going to get drenched, so I stuffed all my things into that big hollow oak by the bars. After the rain I sent her little Joe after them, and he brought me everything but my box of pills. To-day I stopped in to see Richard, and I thought I'd get the pills on my way back. You know Richard fell yesterday morning and bruised his leg, so he can't walk. It isn't anything serious, but his mother said he should stay on the lounge for a day or two. Well, I couldn't find the pill box, but I did get this marble out of the tree. I was so surprised to find it all wrapped up so nicely, for I had no marble among my things."

After Mrs. Parker had heard the story of the postoffice and gone on her way, Dorothy crept into her mother's arms and said: "Dear mamma, I'm so glad I didn't put the thistles into the tree. And now I'm going to go right over and give that marble to Richard and tell him how sorry I am. I'm sure it is naughty to get even. Why, I never had any cause to want to get even, did I?"

Mrs. Bliss kissed her eager little girl and said: "My darling, if people would only wait to have things explained, there would be very little cause for any one to want to get even in this world. Don't forget that, and you will be a very happy little girl.—Hilda Richmond, in the Herald and Presbyter.

The Crystal Vision.

That only is wise to be done which in death ye shall wish ye had done. Seasons of sorrow or sickness or approaching death have shown persons a whole life in different colors from what it wore before; how what before seemed "grace" was but "nature"; how seeming zeal for God was but natural activity; how love of human praise had robbed men of the praise of God; how what they thought pleasing to God was only pleasing self; how one subtle self-pleasing sin has cankered a whole life of seeming grace, wherever, then, we may be in the course heavenwards, morning by morning let us place before ourselves that morning which has no evening, and purpose we to do that, and that only, which we shall wish we had done when we shall see it in the light of that morning, when in the brightness of His presence every plea of self-love which now clouds our eyes shall melt away.—E. "To help make strong, keen, red-blooded Americans there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York and the Westchester County Hospital.

Nuxated Iron often increases the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, run-down people in two weeks' time. It is conservatively estimated that Nuxated Iron is now being used by over three million people annually, and it has been used and endorsed by such men as Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, former Secretary of the Treasury and ex-Governor of Iowa; former United States Senator and Presidential nominee, Chas. A. Towne; General John L. Clem (Retired), the drummer boy of Shiloh who was sergeant in the U. S. Army when only 12 years of age; also United States Judge G. W. Atkinson of the Court of Claims of Washington and others. Nuxated Iron is dispensed by all good druggists everywhere.

Across the surging ocean,
In the matchless land of France,
Under sheltering trees in the festful woods,

Where yellow sunbeams softly glance,
His honors costly won,
Lies Virginia's son.

Undisturbed by roar of cannon,

Or the shock of bomb or shell,

His fair young body calmly rests

In the land he loved so well;

But his freed spirit

Goes on and on.

And men are braver because of him,

For his comrades feel his power.

Aye, closer he seems in the struggle now

Than in his living hour.

His spirit untrammelled

Now leads them on.

When the last battle has been fought,

And the last great victory won,

When little peoples unafraid

May rejoice under God's bright sun,

They will bear him home again,

Virginia's son,

But his brave spirit

Goes on and on.

MRS. MARGARET McLOUTH KING.

In loving memory of MARGARET McLOUTH KING, who entered into her eternal rest on Transfiguration day, August 6, 1918. Mrs. King was the beloved wife of Major William M. King and the mother of Mrs. W. C. Welburn, with whom she had made her home in Ballston, Va., for the past six years.

Born in Monroe County, Mich., September 18, 1848, she spent many years of her life as a teacher and writer and was always an inspiration for good to those who came under her influence. For several years her home was in Glencarllyn, Alexandria County, Va., and she will be remembered with many loving thoughts by those graduates of the Virginia Theological Seminary who were interested in the Glencarllyn Mission. A devoted Churchwoman and conscientious member of the Daughters of the King, her life was one of constant prayer and personal service in the spread of Christ's Kingdom upon earth. She was at one time an earnest worker in St. Stephen's Church, Washington, D. C., and was one of the organizers of St. George's Church, Farlee, near Ballston, Va. At the time of her death, although she had been ill for two years, she was President of the Guild and of the Daughters of the King of St. George's Church.

To Thy Work.

"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." That is splendid advice at any time, and for any occasion, but it seems to have a special appropriateness and force for the present day. When others are doing so much and serving so heroically and self-sacrificingly, it would surely be a most incongruous and tragic thing if we were to spend our days in listlessness and indifference, and without any high and holy ambition for the common good. To do nothing earnestly, to attempt nothing that is difficult, to sacrifice nothing that is precious and worth-while, would surely be to prove ourselves out of touch with and unworthy of the day in which we live; this day of days in the history of the world. The time calls for work, for work that demands the best that is in us, for work that seeks some other good than merely our own. And if we are not responding to that call with sincerity and faithfulness, we are proving ourselves traitors to humanity in a day when we are sorely needed.—Selected.

Love Toward Men.

It is only when we begin to love other people, and become rooted and grounded in love to them, that we learn to know what Christ's love is to us. You must love a woman that you may understand what Christ feels for His Church; you must love a child to know how God feels to His children; you must love a friend to know how Christ feels toward His friend. Every time you do an unselfish, gentle, tender thing, it is another window into the love of God. You must go lengths to understand the length of His love.

which is everlasting; you must go depths to the infamy and degradation of such as you would help if you would understand the depth of the love of Christ; you must go breadths outside the narrow limits of your charity to understand His broad expanse of love;

and you must climb to heights, bearing up some languid, fainting soul, if you will understand something of the upspringing of Christ's love that bears us in His ascension climb. Love men if you want to know the love of Christ. —F. B. Meyer.

BEFORE YOU GO TO FRANCE LEARN FRENCH AND ABOUT FRANCE

"The American Soldier in France"

A military guide-book for our troops going abroad, by Geo. N. Tricoche, late of the French army.

Read what the chief of staff says about it:

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES

Office of the Chief of Staff

(Extracts from a letter dated General Headquarters, October 15, 1917.)

"... The six copies of 'The American Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing... and the remainder will be distributed to staff officers...."

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover.... Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc."....

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

Personal Notes

The Rev. W. E. Allen, rector of St. Michael's Parish, St. Michael's, Maryland, has resigned, the resignation effective September 1.

The Rev. Percy W. Jones has resigned St. George's Church, Griffin, Georgia; and after the first of October will serve Calvary Church, Americus, Georgia.

The Rev. William Way, rector of Grace Church, Charleston, S. C., is the special preacher for the month of September at St. James Church, Philadelphia, the Rev. John Mockridge, D. D., rector.

In the absence of a regular army chaplain from Fort Brown, the Rev. Benjamin Dennis, rector of the Church of the Advent, Brownsville, Texas, is acting as chaplain for the garrison. Dr. Dennis for many years served as chaplain for the Second Virginia Infantry, and first came to the border in that capacity.

The Rev. Walter P. Griggs, for several years the rector of St. Stephen's Parish, East Newmarket, Maryland, has resigned that charge.

DEATHS.

The Rev. George Walker, a minister of the Diocese of Massachusetts, died at his home in Roxbury, Mass., on August 21. The funeral took place from St. Paul's Church, Peabody, on Friday, August 23.

The service of man is the most essential activity in the service of God, and the love of humanity is a necessary element in the love of God.—Canon Streeter.

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

To be loved in any fashion is to incur a great responsibility.

The same wind that destroys the chaff cleans the wheat.

The Bible is the only book ever written that points out a sure way to become rich.

Whenever the preacher calls the devil by his right name somebody in the congregation has his feelings hurt.

Do not dare to live without some clear intention toward which your living shall be bent. Mean to be something with all your might.—Brooks

If thou art blest,
Then let the sunshine of thy gladness rest

On the dark edges of each cloud that lies

Black in thy brother's skies.

If thou art sad,
Still be thou in thy brother's gladness glad.

Nothing can pacify an offended conscience save that which satisfies an offended God.

Remember, you have not a sinew whose law of strength is not action; you have not a faculty of body, mind, or soul whose law of improvement is not energy.—Hall.

"What is needed," says Dr. Strong, "is not simply an increased giving, an enlarged estimate of the Lord's share, but a radically different conception of our relation to our possessions."

To work to help and to be helped, to learn sympathy through suffering, to learn faith through perplexity, to reach truth through wonder—behold, this is what it is to prosper, this is what it is to live!

Be not anxious about to-morrow. Do to-day's duty, fight to-day's temptation, and do not weaken and distract yourself by looking forward to things which you cannot see and could not understand if you saw them.

Humanity is already on the threshold of its higher development. We stand on the brink of such untold joys and deeper satisfaction that there is no room for repining or regret.

The world draws a horizontal line of division, or rather two lines, that mark off humanity into three sections—the upper, middle and lower classes. Christ draws a vertical line throughout the whole scale, dividing society into two parts, those on the right and those on the left—the sheep and the goats.

Pray without ceasing, says the zealous Paul.

But what means this? Must we not work, nor eat, Nor take our rest? Is prayer to swallow all?

Are knees to serve in lieu of hands and feet?

Nay, I will show thee what is ceaseless prayer:

First; 'tis a heart to prayer for aye inclined;

Next, that it be of all our choicest care,

Next, that we ask the Counsellor to share

Each sorrow of the body and the mind;

Next, that we cease not till our good we find,

Like him who said, "I will not let Thee part Until Thou bless"; next, that our spirits dart

Their pious glances, when they can, on high;

Last, that we bound each day with morn and evening cry.

Renew Your Health At Nature's Fountain

Without the Expense and Loss of Time Necessary for a Visit to the Spring

THE CRISIS

There comes a time in the life of practically every man and woman when their digestive or eliminative organs, or both, fail to respond to drugs prepared by human skill. In fact drugs seem to do them about as much harm as good for their systems rebel against all drugs. These are the cases which physicians call "stubborn" and "chronic" for the reason that they persist in spite of drug treatment. I do not refer to incurable diseases such as cancer and consumption, but to that larger class of functional disorders which we meet every day, where the organs of digestion and elimination are impaired.

For this class of cases our best physicians and our big city specialists send their wealthy patients to the mineral springs where, in the great majority of cases they are permanently restored or decidedly benefited. But what about the poor man who has not the money or the busy man or woman who cannot spare the time to spend several weeks or possibly months at a health resort? Shall circumstances deny them the restoration to health which Nature has provided? Read my answer in the coupon at the bottom of this page.

I have the utmost confidence in the Shivar Mineral Spring Water for to it I owe my Restoration to Health and probably my Life. It has made me tens of thousands of friends in all parts of America and even in foreign countries, whose faces I have never seen. Yet I count them my friends for the Shivar Spring Water has bound them to me by lasting gratitude.

I ask you to read their letters, a few samples of which I publish below for your benefit, and if you find among them any encouragement as to your own health do not hesitate to accept my offer which has no limits or conditions except those shown on the coupon. If you could read the letters that come to me daily, numbering about ten thousand a year, and the vast majority of them similar to those printed below, you would not wonder that I make this offer displaying my absolute confidence in the restorative powers of Shivar Mineral Water.

INDIGESTION

Savannah, Georgia.

I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and, of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered ten gallons of your Mineral Water which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months gained twenty-nine pounds, was strong and perfectly well, and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

La Grange, Ga., Nov. 25, 1914.

I feel it my duty to suffering humanity to make public announcement of the benefits I have derived from Shivar Spring Water. I have been a sufferer for the past twenty-five years from indigestion and dyspepsia. After one week's trial of Shivar Water I commenced to improve, and after drinking it for four weeks I gained fifteen pounds. I feel better and stronger than I have in twenty-five years. I strongly recommend this Water to any one with stomach trouble of any character, and truly believe it will cure ulcer of the stomach. I am writing this voluntarily and trust it will fall in the hands of many who are so unfortunate as to be afflicted with indigestion and nervous dyspepsia.

C. V. TRUITT,

President Unity Cotton Mills.

DYSPEPSIA

Baltimore, Md., April 30, 1914.

For many years I suffered with stomach trouble as a direct result of asthma. I consulted the very best specialist in this country, and spent quite a large sum of money in my endeavor to get relief. However, I had about come to the conclusion that my case was hopeless, but by accident I happened to get hold of one of your booklets, and decided to try Shivar Spring Water. After drinking the water for about three weeks I was entirely relieved, and since that time have suffered but little inconvenience from my trouble. I cheerfully recommend the use of your Water to any one that may be suffering from stomach trouble.

It is a great pleasure to tell you that your Water has been a great benefit. I may say a great blessing, to me. My wife says it has helped me more than anything else I ever tried. I have been, for thirty years, a sufferer from stomach trouble.

REV. E. H. ROWE,

Co-President Southern Seminary.

RHEUMATISM

Leeds, S. C.

I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of rheumatism, chronic indigestion, kidney and bladder troubles, and in nervous and sick headaches, and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the liver, kidneys and bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter.

C. A. CROSBY, M. D.

Florence, S. C.

I suffered with indigestion and kidney trouble, and a year ago was stricken with acute articular rheumatism; was helpless for months, and since using your Spring Water I am walking without any crutch and improving daily. Indigestion much relieved. I wish I could write Shivar Spring Water in the sky so that the world could become acquainted with it.

MRS. THEO. KUKER.

BILIOUSNESS

Greenville, S. C., Feb. 25, 1914.

For over two years, following a nervous breakdown I have suffered with a liver so torpid that ordinary remedies were absolutely powerless. Under such circumstances, I came to Shivar Spring, and began drinking the Water. Upon advice however, the first night I took a laxative; the second night a milder one. Since then I have taken none at all. The effect of the water has been remarkable — its action on my liver most marked, and my health and spirits greatly improved. I am satisfied that the laxative, followed by the Water, was the proper treatment in my case. My condition is now perfect.

RENAL AND CYSTIC

Columbia, S. C.

I suffered for eight years with kidney trouble and inflammation of the bladder to the extent that I would have to get up during the night some five or six times. After using this water only a few days, I am entirely relieved and suffer no more effect of the trouble whatever.

High Point, N. C., Oct. 6, 1914.

My wife has had a bad kidney trouble for several years. She has been using the water only about three weeks and it has already made her a new woman. Her color is much improved, her appetite is all that she could wish for, her digestion seems to be perfect. We give Shivar Springs credit for it all.

GALLSTONES

Greenville, S. C.

Shivar Spring Water cured my mother of gallstones, or, I might say, it snatched her from the hospital door, as the doctors had said nothing short of an operation would do her any good. After drinking the Water she was able to get out of bed, and is today stout and healthy. I hope these few lines will be of help to some one suffering as my mother did.

My doctor said I would have to be operated on for gallstones, but since I have been drinking your water I haven't had to have a doctor.

Saving is No Real Hardship.

The saving of food has been so efficiently preached and has been so well organized by patriotic women following advice of the government that we may merely remark that we can do still better without harm to ourselves and with great benefit to the war cause. Most people are better off for restricting the use of sugar. A consumption tax on sugar of several cents a pound would do little harm in connection with the rationing. Most people make their tea and coffee far too strong. There should be a large revenue tax on tea and coffee, which everybody could pay with ease by the simple device of using more hot water. It has not been creditable to millions of otherwise intelligent American women that they know so little about cooking and real food values. The country is fast learning to use more peas and beans and less meat. It is saving transportation by securing a higher percentage of its food supply from home gardens and other local sources. If we send—as we will—more than three million of our men and boys to France it would be an eternal disgrace not to keep them supplied with plenty of good food from home. We can only be sure of doing this by stopping all waste, restricting the use of wheat and beef, and applying both brains and industry to the food conservation problem. Let us "Hooverize" for another year!

We shall have much greater need to economize in food and in fuel this coming winter than last winter. Everywhere in the world there is a great scarcity of wool, and while for the sake of health we should dress comfortably in winter, it should be made disgraceful to dress extravagantly. There will be nothing so vulgar and so far from good form as to pay undue attention to alleged "fashions" as regards costume. In every other country on earth, all people, whether rich or poor, are thankful if they possess a supply of old clothes, and they regard it as patriotic to bring to light discarded things and leave the entire new wool crop for army use. This is no minor affair, but a deadly serious one. Last year hundreds of our boys died in the camps because cold weather overtook them before the quartermaster's department had got their winter uniforms and overcoats ready. Civilians will have to buy many articles of dress; but it will help all trades, including the clothing trade itself, if every man, woman and child gets as much wear as possible out of garments already in hand. Give the new wool to 4,000,000 soldiers.—American Review of Reviews for September, 1918.

Christian Unity.

Robert H. Gardiner.

That they all may be one . . . that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.—St. John 17, 21.

Christian unity is not negative, but positive; not merely abstaining from ecclesiastical controversies and sectarian competition, but the indisputable evidence which will bring the world to Christ, for it is the manifestation of the one Life of God Incarnate in the Person of His Son that He may offer to man that participation in His Life by which man may be redeemed.

We are too apt to think of unity as if it were merely of organization or government. Christ prayed for a unity of will and love, so that we might have life and power to manifest Him to His world through the Church, which is His Body. The motive for unity is the desire to bring the world to Christ, and the only road to success in missions, at home or abroad, the only hope for establishing peace and righteousness and love between nations and classes, individuals and churches, is the manifestation of the one Life. Who alone is able to subdue all things unto Himself.

So when our Lord offered Himself as a sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, He prayed for the unity of His disciples as the potent evidence necessary to convince and convert mankind.

If the world is to be convinced that Christ came to redeem mankind, it must be by something that the world can see. So Christian unity must be visible. Spiritual unity alone is not effective, for it is not recognized by the world which knows not the things of the spirit. Unity must be spiritual, for the spirit is life, and the spirit of unity is the one Life of the world. But if it be truly spiritual, it will manifest itself visibly.

Let us pray: That we may see that the visible unity of Christians is the means by which Christ is to be lifted up that He may draw all men to Him.

That we may see that a divided Christianity cannot with one mind and one mouth glorify God and proclaim the gospel of the one Redeemer.

That we may see how our divisions blur the vision of the one Lord and keep Him from His world.

That we may see that our divisions make the world think that Christ is divided.

That we may see that our divisions distract our minds and repel those who hear of Christ only through our discordant voices.

That we may see that we cannot bring about unity of ourselves, and that all we can or need do is to surrender our wills to the one Will of God.

That each of us, and all of us together, may, by complete surrender to Him Who is the Life, be filled with His Presence and manifest Him to the world.

What It Means to Be As Busy As a Bee.

Do you know what it means to be busy as bees, children, when the days are longest and the weather is hot? Perhaps not, it may be your play-time.

But if you are in the country where the bees live, go and watch them. Sit a little way from their hives so that you will not make them fretful, and see how they work. From early morning until night they are out, scouring the country for honey, or for the yellow wax which they carry on their legs.

Now let me tell you something. When you are back in school, working away over the arithmetic or geography in winter-time, the bees are having their vacation. They are nestling down cozily in their hives, sleeping, or eating just enough to keep them alive until the flowers bloom again.

And then—oh, what a buzzing and a to-do there is in the old hive! How the drones have to get out, and leave the house-cleaning to be done by the lady bees; and how those lady bees do work all summer to feed their queen, and to lay up stores for the winter!

So you see the life of the bee is a busy one when there is any work to be done, and that you may know how useful a little creature the honey-making bee is, remember, if you can, that the wax and the honey that the bees make each year in the United States are worth $6,000,000.—Our Dumb Animals.

Humanity's Greatest Enemy.

The greatest enemy of humanity is worldliness. It takes on many forms, but it grips the heart and holds the people to the earth when they should be rising toward heaven. Any theory of life that puts the strongest emphasis upon the present life and upon material and physical comforts here may be unhesitatingly condemned as destructive of man's highest good.—Raleigh Christian Advocate.

PEACE.

Since the tide of war seems to have turned and our armies are now driving the foe, we are being warned by those whose judgment we trust against the expectation of an early peace. It is victory, complete and overmastering, and not peace that we must set before us, and that may be and probably is quite far in the future. The power of the enemy is not broken nor his legions destroyed. We have yet a heavy price to pay in continued anxiety and sacrifice before the peace that we will accept shall be ours, and a premature expectation of it will only weaken our hands and undermine our determination. We must be confident, but patient and resolute in meeting all the heavy demands which are yet to be made upon us.

But while we strive for that peace which will only come through force of arms we may be made stronger and more hopeful by a glad recognition of that which has already come as a result of this righteous war. Paradoxical as it may seem, we believe there is more peace in the world to-day than ever before.

Were ever so many nations united in stronger bonds of peace than at the present moment? Think of the long array of peoples, great and small, whom we are proud to call our allies, who are being cemented together in mutual trust and amity, their old jealousies and suspicions of each other put to shame, and they looking forward to a league of nations based on justice and humanity to supplant an artificial and precarious balance of power. When the hideous blot on the map of the world representing Prussian domination has been wiped out, war, let us hope, will also have passed out of the purposes and counsels of the nations. But that reign of peace will be but the fruition of this which the war has already established among the allied nations and which is the secret of their strength and the sure augury of their victory.

The same principle we find working in the midst of our own people as, we are told, it is with our allies. Sectional feeling and the jealousies of class and caste are, for the moment at least, being lost in one great cause and interest. There is a new standard of worth and a new bond of fellowship between men who are doing their duty. The only man one dares to look down upon is the slacker, the coward or the profiteer. If a man is falling short because he is ignorant we do not despise him but instruct him, feeling the need of each for the other. We assure him of a fair deal and a full recognition of his services. Animosities are being forgotten and a truer democracy is having its birth in the heart of the people.

There is peace of another kind, very different from all this, but having its root in the same soil, which is also abounding to-day and bringing forth its fruit. We mean that peace of heart and mind which goes with duty well done, with sorrow or suffering bravely borne; God's own recompense for every sacrifice made in His cause. How real and precious that is they know best who have done or given most. But in the heart of every true man and woman who is doing, bearing, even feeling as he or she can with a willing mind, there is something of it. There is a peace to-day in the bleeding hearts of America, of France and England, of Belgium and Serbia, which the world cannot give; which the world does not recognize perhaps, because it is the peace of unselfish service and sacrifice, the peace of the Cross.

For the Cross is the one great reconciliation. The Cross of Christ first, drawing the world unto God in His redeeming love, and then those kindred crosses born of His which He gives to those who follow Him in a righteous cause and in self-denying service. It breaks down the walls of partition between diverse peoples and between man and man. It reconciles souls unto God in His purposes and providences, and sheds a peace that passeth understanding upon hearts that serve or suffer according to His will.

Doubtless that is one of the lessons God is teaching His world, His children, to-day. "My peace I give unto you," said the Master, but "not as the world giveth give I unto you." And we have supposed He meant a peace less costly, less hardly won, less worthily received perhaps, than that we can extort from the service of the world. But it is the peace of His Cross translated into our lives—there is none other. The world's peace, sought by avoiding, disdaining, rejecting the Cross in all of its phases, is no peace, but discord and enmity within and without. Of that sort Christ brought "not peace but a sword." The peace of God men find on their Calvaries, where self with its lusts and greed are crucified with Christ.

And because many nations and countless patriotic souls have thus taken up His Cross with His sword, we believe that great is the peace even now ruling in their hearts, strengthening, consoling and uniting them in one body, and are thankful.

HUMOR AND KINDLINESS.

A correspondent writes to us for a bit of advice. She is troubled because some of her friends are given to amusing themselves by criticism or making fun of others, their speech, dress, appearance, etc. They even take this questionable habit to church sometimes and find material for humorous comment in the minister or choir or congregation. Our correspondent does not think this sort of thing is either gracious or becoming. She is very sure these same people would be very indignant if they themselves were made the subject of ridicule. From a Christian standpoint what should one do under the circumstances? Express disapproval, and so vex one's friends and be charged with lack of humor or with self-righteousness, or let such remarks pass unrebuked at the risk of seeming to acquiesce in them?

Very many good people have been perplexed by the same question. If any of our readers knows the answer we would be glad to hear from him or her on the subject.

Speaking generally, we would say that to meet the conditions described satisfactorily in all cases one needs to be possessed of quick and discriminating religious instincts, a genuine sense of humor of one's own, and not a little tact and cleverness. And these should have been cultivated long before, so that the mind, the facial expression and the tongue will react to them instantly and automatically. A person so endowed, and having also a large modicum of common sense, ought to be able to meet the situation with success.

A discriminating instinct is needed to determine whether the remark or jest is really malicious and infected with poison or is merely a flippancy which will die promptly of its own inanity as most sparks of wit do. In the latter case do not try to blow it out, just let it die. If it is obviously mean and malicious one cannot, of course, give it approval. A counter-remark of an opposite character will often extract the sting if one can think of the right thing to say at the moment—which one seldom can. A mild and good-natured—be sure that it is good-natured—expression of dissent is usually effective and is more easily accomplished. An open rebuke should seldom be spoken except by a person whose age or position gives him or her authority to reprove; unless, indeed, one's righteous indignation has been so aroused as both to demand it and to back it up. Probably the best answer is a complete vacancy of expression, not registering disapproval or self-consciousness but a simple negation of intelligence. Some people can assume this attitude without half trying, but we have known a few very wise men who had cultivated it and could use it with fine effect. It is a great discourager of foolish talking, and the more one can look like a good-natured wooden image the more effective it is.

But probably one's best defence against this stinging species of wit, as against many other of the ills of life, is the possession of a keen sense of humor kept in good working order by constant use. Real humor, we believe, is always humane and kindly. Its mission is to please, to cheer, to lighten the heaviness or the monotony of life; and blessed is the man who has this pleasing gift. It is a wonderful defense against the slings and arrows of fortune and a wholesome medicine to dispense to others who take things, and themselves most of all, too seriously. Wit may be caustic, cynical, offensive, and so wit is not always humorous. One of the uses of humor is to extract the sting of wit and to neutralize its bitter taste; also to render the hearer and even the object of it immune to its hurtful qualities, for very often the harm of jesting criticism or comment upon others lies in the ear of the hearer more than in the tongue of the critic. Ill-nature and spite may easily be charged by suspicious and over-serious minds where only fun and good humor is intended by the really more sympathetic speaker. The foibles and peculiarities and even the stupidities of people make their impression on the mind and are often best neutralized and disposed of by harmless and especially humorous criticism even though it amounts to good-natured ridicule.

Our Lord Himself was once so mortified by having to hear an 'over-true but maliciously-told story, that to hide His embarrassment "He stooped down and wrote on the ground as though He heard them not." On another occasion He held certain solemn and self-conceited men up to ridicule by humorously comparing them with quarrelsome children playing their silly games in the marketplace. There seems to be no rule in the matter save to cultivate for oneself and to commend to others such a kindly, generous and discriminating spirit that ill-nature and meanness will retire therefrom for lack of hospitality.

APPEAL FOR HELP IN MOUNTAIN WORK.

Mr. Editor: A very plaintive letter from Miss Julia Boyd, who has charge of mountain work in Clarke County, Virginia, has just reached me. She needs and ought to have an assistant. Her work in the mountains is valuable and is done for a people who sorely need it. The conditions of life at Afoha Lodge, Bluemont, are difficult but she has good friends among the mountain people, and is extremely interested in the welfare of the children. I write this in the hope that some one or more of your readers, who want to do the best kind of work in the mountains, the most needed and the most touching, seeing this letter, will write speedily to Miss Julia E. Boyd, at Afoha Lodge, Bluemont, Virginia, and put themselves as far as possible at her service for this most helpful and Christian work.

A Wooden Cross.

Ida Mason Burke.

(To Lieutenant Randolph Fitzhugh Mason, killed in action July 20, 1918.)

A wooden cross, rough-hewn by soldier hands,
And underneath the well earned resting place
Of one who seeing the invisible
Ran ardently the final splendid race.

The battle cry of freedom stirred in him
A swift response, nor did he hesitate;
Like France, he saw Democracy assailed
And caught the challenge from the hand of fate.

What though his body sleeps in foreign soil,
Since he has died to serve humanity,
Beyond all space is his—and he has won

A Wooden Cross, and wears it worthily.

GOODNESS-PLUS.

That which Moses did for the nation in the large is continually being done for individuals or groups or communities by influential persons. They have their various forms of occupations and go about their daily business seeming to themselves to exist mainly for that, but their chief value in the world is to make their neighbors to believe in God, not with their mind only, but in their consciences and in their common conduct. In such belief the creed and the commandments meet. Our faith in God when it is taken out of the field of argument and set in the field of action expresses our distinction between right and wrong, and our convictions about what we believe is right and wrong in life are determined according to what we believe in God. So it is that whoever affects our belief in God affects us mightily. Whoever influences us in shaping our belief affects us mightily.

They who have large beliefs in God and are able to influence us so that their ideas become ours also, are the most useful and influential persons in the community. By referring to the Old Testament we learn that people began to believe in God by believing in Moses, but they believed in Moses because he stood for and did that which compelled belief. They could not help believing in him; they had evidence of his works. They were impressed by that undeniable quality of the man which we call his personality and all this worked together to make his influence good. He had a thousand neighbors who were good—devoted and righteous men who did their duty and served God, but we have never heard their names; the name of Moses is memorable and influential to this day even because it is commended to our attention by his special gifts of courage, steadfastness, ability. He was not only good, but great; he was good-plus.

We all recognize the fact that while goodness is always excellent it is not always attractive. Sometimes goodness is dull and commonplace. There are those who seem to be good not because they love and believe in God but because they have no imagination, no initiative; they follow the conventional paths. Their hearts beat with slow and proper regularity and are never quickened by the possibility of adventure. The best we can say is that they are good, not eminent, nor wise, nor able, nor particularly pleasing to meet; they are just good. Sometimes goodness is hard and forbidding. It is allied with strength and mastery. It makes itself respected but not loved. It lacks grace and beauty. It makes no allowance. It takes life seriously. It has no sense of humor. It smiles with reluctance and difficulty. Its attitude toward the exuberant spirit of youth is that of the traditional schoolmaster toward schoolboy enthusiasm. The goodness they feel is a matter of order and discipline and conscience and the exact performance of one's duty.

Dull goodness and hard goodness misrepresent Christian religion which is indeed hospitable to commonplace persons and to those who regard life seriously, but which has a big place for the influential man. It also takes a plain, commonplace man and transforms him into an influential man. Thus it took fishermen and peasants and made them into apostles, and is working similar miracles every day; bringing out new strength and ability; it is making men aware of their possibilities and desirous of making the best of themselves to-day just as it did in the days of Christ. It makes men dissatisfied to be merely passive, inert, inactive, and to have a non-contributive goodness. Goodness is thus made influential. It verifies the parable of the leaven and affects the whole of society. This is brought about not by virtue of conscious missionary effort, but by its natural missionary influence. From some people the quality of goodness emanates; they are helpful wherever they go and without knowing it, even as the shadow of St. Peter healed the sick.

We may take the example of two men in a community. One is simply good, not a noticeably good business man, not especially good citizen or neighbor, or even a very good companion; he does nothing remarkably well; even his goodness is a negative quality, and consists in doing nothing remarkably ill. The other is good-plus; he is respected for his ability, strength, skill; he succeeds and wins devotion. The goodness of this man is made additionally influential by every kind of accomplishment he has. Everything he does works for good. It is as the cipher which increases the value of a unit, which multiplies it by 10. Every day he effectively denies that goodness is necessarily dull and slow.—Dean Hodges, to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

THE CHURCH AND LABOR.

The Church of Jesus Christ, who Himself set His seal to the high dignity of work by the labor of His own hands, should be deeply sympathetic with all workers both with hands and brain. She must be "witnessing both to small and great" her demand for justice—justice that will secure to the capitalist an equitable return for his investment of brains and money, and to the laborer such a share in the fruits of his industry as will secure the welfare of himself and family, and an atmosphere of happiness in his home and in all his associations.

We are glad to affirm that the Church in our day is not only sympathetic with the attainment of these objects, but actively engaged in promoting them. Christian people individually, and through their organizations, have been working for such hours of labor as will afford due opportunity and time for rest, recreation and cultivation of the powers of the body, mind and soul. The Church has been insistent on the preservation of the Lord's day from unnecessary demands for toil. Christian men and women, organized for social service, have worked for better housing, for the inspection of mines, shops and factories, for the securing to children their rights to education, and the enjoyment of a real childhood, for the bettering of the condition of women workers. These objects common to both the Church and the labor organizations should be prosecuted with increasing fervor and unflagging zeal.

The Church's great opportunity at this hour is to revive the spirit of fellowship one with another which was her distinguishing characteristic in her earliest days. Her mission is to bring the principles of her Master into full practical operation. She must have again a world conception, and show by her concern for all men, irrespective of race or nationality or religion, that she believes in the brotherhood of man, as dependent on the Fatherhood of God, revealed and mediated to us by Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord.

Looking to the future, and especially to the days when this war shall be over, we must see that the fruits of the great victory shall be conserved, that we secure those conditions of life and liberty that will make democracy safe and lasting. We must all strive for full justice between man and man. We should strive for such a readjustment of the relations of capital and labor as will bring co-operation and good will and mutual endeavor for the welfare of all elements of the community. A reorganization is bound to come. Let us strongly urge the capitalist and the employer to assume towards his brother of the labor order, such a sympathetic attitude, such a oneness of interest as to give the country and especially labor itself the benefit of the united wisdom of the brotherhood.—From Bishop Harding's Labor Day Pastoral.

WHAT ABOUT THE WOMEN OUTSIDE OF THE CHURCH?

By Eva Ryerson Ludgate.

Not long ago I received a letter from an English woman who has charge of a military hospital in England. She writes: "The women of England have been praying but we have even in these sad times stayed by ourselves and prayed with our small group of friends in our own churches—nothing has been done for the thousands of sorrowing women outside the Church. I hope the Christian women of the United States will not make the same mistake."

There is a question I would like to ask every minister in the United States: What are you planning to do for the women of your community who have so bravely given their sons in their country's service—I mean the women who are outside the Church? They may belong to patriotic organizations but, splendid as this work is, there is no balm for a broken heart in the knitting needle, the bandage, or in patriotic service; there is only one source of comfort and that comfort is to be found in Christ through prayer.

A mother who has given her only son writes: "I think there are two kinds of mothers: the one mother who has her society friends and her husband, perhaps another child, brother, sister or a relative, and the mother who has no one to comfort her in her hour of loneliness."

The National Women's Prayer Battalion has been raised up to help the Church meet this great need. It does not multiply organizations, but in a very simple and beautiful way it gives the pastor or his assistant a point of contact and an entrance into every home which has a service flag in its window.

The need of such an organization was brought home during a visit to England in the third year of the war. The Battalion now has members in thirty-six States and two foreign countries.

CAMOUFLAGING THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

To camouflage is to hide, mislead, take in, beguile, fool. It is reduced to a high art by man, even to hiding himself from himself. The heart is the great camouflagist. It is "deceitful, above all things, and desperately wicked." Because of this the camouflaging of Holy Scripture comes easy.

The Scriptures themselves do not camouflage. They are a light set on a stand to give light to all in the house. But in the nature of the case their meaning is sometimes hidden because man has his limitations. At his highest reach he touches not even the hem of the garment of God. Texts do not camouflage, but interpreters do. They may by an interpretation, artificial, foreign, false, make the Scriptures say anything. As there are mysteries in the revelations of God, so there are simplicities that the mind of a child, and only the childlike mind can grasp and live on. The Scripture does not, as a fact, and cannot as a purpose, hide its meaning, but the preacher may conceal its meaning and pervert its intent, and make his own thoughts march before the congregation in the livery of heaven.

Such camouflaging may have a variety of causes. A not uncommon one is ignorance of the meaning of the text, and such ignorance is, for the preacher, inexcusable. If he does not understand his text he should not use it. It is bad enough that he should not know what he is talking about, but worse that he should be spreading his ignorance like a contagious disease among people who have come for healing. This is too often the fault of intellectual laziness. Thinking is hard, logical thinking is harder, and thinking for the highest good of a mixed congregation is harder still. That is to say, the right preparation of a sermon is hard work.

Other causes are, erroneous doctrinal bias that blinds the judgment; intellectual dishonesty that discolors the thought; mental lethargy that shuns strenuous effort and thorough investigation; selfish considerations that makes one withhold, or exaggerate, or deal in moral platitudes or platitudinous technicalities; a straining for rhetorical effect or self-exploitation; or much learning that makes one wise above what is written. Whatever the cause it is unreasonable, whatever the motive, it is disobedience to Him who said, "Go preach, and teach whatsoever I have commanded you."

Preaching stands first in importance in a minister's duty, for there is no Gospel for the world without it. Since Christ went back from earth to His Father the preaching of the Gospel has been committed to men; and to men who know certain things. The preacher who feels that sin is death, and Christ the only Saviour; that sin is the one supremely hideous disease of body and soul, and that the Holy Ghost is the alone power that can make and keep pure and clean the heart wherein sin finds a congenial home; that Christ died for all when He died for him, and that he is commanded to proclaim this to the world—that preacher cannot exalt himself in the pulpit or pass off a stone for bread, or give to drink the muddy traditions of men for the water of life. The remedy for camouflaging is knowing Christ.

The preaching office must assert its dignity and power. St. Paul, called by some free-thinker, "the brains of Christianity," says, "I magnify my office"—as a preacher to the Gentiles. Again he says, "Though we are an angel from heaven—though any man—preach any other Gospel than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." And once more, "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." But there is a vast difference between the "foolishness of preaching" like St. Paul's, and the preaching of foolishness like the camouflagists. But one says, conditions have changed since St. Paul's day. Yes, outwardly and on the surface, but not inwardly and in the depths. Human nature is the same to-day as yesterday and will be so long as man is. The Kaiser of to-day has the same sanguinary instincts as the Herod of Judea. The Hun of the nineteenth century is the same Hun as in the days of Attila. The scientific murderer by submarines, poisonous gasses and microbes of death in the bandages of the wounded, show the same heart as murderers of old time, though their methods be different. Take the composite man of this century with all his culture, turn on his heart the X-ray of spiritual light, and you will find the same cancer of sin, the same pulsations of vile passions, the same throbbing lusts that lay in the heart when the Great Physician gave his diagnosis to the world—"Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, deceit, lasciviousness, wickedness, an evil eye, blasphemy," and more. A moral Pecksniff denies this. A brutal Bill Sikes swears it a lie, but a good man like St. Paul cries out, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" "Stop," you say, "you are drawing a horrible picture!" But I am not picturing anything. The Great Physician, "unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid"—the supreme diagnostician, draws the picture. Our congregations are essentially the same as those the Apostles preached to, and the preaching of the twentieth century must be the same in essentials as the preaching of the first. The preaching office must assert itself in dealing with eternal verities. It must show man his very soul, however painful the sight, and what is before him after death, however terrible the picture; must show him what the Lord has done for him on Calvary, however agonizing the spectacle; show him that the Holy Ghost has come to lead him all the days of his life in true holiness and righteousness, to the great white throne.

There are groups of texts on which the foundations of Christian religion are builded and even these are too often camouflaged. "Being justified by faith we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." "God hath made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." By faith in Jesus Christ the soul is saved. With faith salvation is sure—without faith there is separation from God. In God's way Christ takes our sins. Through the believing of this we are justified before God. We speak, not of historic faith, which the devils have and tremble, nor of an assumed faith, for the sake of loaves and fishes, but of justifying faith. If a man shall come to me to-day and ask, "What shall I do to be saved?" will it be an insufficient answer if I say, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ"? If a whole congregation come to me and ask, "What shall we do that we might work the works of God?" Am I insufficient if I say, in the very words of Christ, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him Whom He hath sent"? "What," cries the camouflager in fine moral warmth, "do you say that the sensualist, thief, murderer, is accepted as righteous before God by and at the moment of his belief? That is against reason and nature." We answer, we do not say that God says it. Yes, it is against all human nature, but in perfect harmony with Him Whose Name is Love and nature Righteousness. "Then," he says, "Is there nothing for me to do, no good works, no gifts or religious life for me to practise, that I may have the gift of pardon and adoption"? So far as the Word of God goes, nothing. "Where, then, do good works and a holy life come in?" They do not come in at all, they come out. "I live," says the justified soul, "yet not I, but Christ liveth in me."

Here the camouflager has clearly confused justification with sanctification. Justification is an act done outside of ourselves by the free mercy of Christ our Lord. Sanctification is a work done in us through the Holy Ghost—the continuous renovation of our nature, dead unto sin and alive unto God. Let not good living in all its range be minified by the fact that God gives pardon; rather let it be inspired to the utmost. Nor let it be supposed that we have nothing to do with our spiritual development. We must watch, pray, restrain, deny, crucify self, and work out our salvation with fear and trembling.

Examples of scriptural camouflaging could easily be multiplied. They should put the preacher on his guard. The pulpit is his throne. From it his words have the weight of an accepted authority. Before him, in every congregation, are the sick and ready to die, the troubled and tempted and ready to fall. He is indeed a seer whose eye can penetrate the mask of the quiet face before him and read the secrets of the heart. He shoots his arrow, not at random but at a venture, and often it hits the mark though he hears not the bell. It is his hour. His life may be commonplace, his personality small, but he has God behind him, the needy before him, and the word of life upon his lips. If only he can hold up Him who said, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me," so that not even his own hand shall be seen, then each who receives Him according to his need will go his way praising God that the preacher told him this or that from the word of His truth and led him to the trysting place where he found Him whom his soul desired!

Such is the high office and dignity of him who shows Christ to man. Who is sufficient for these things!

GERMANY'S DREAM OF DOMINION.

From an address by Dr. Richard Heath Dabney, Professor of History, University of Virginia.

* * * The Holy Roman Empire had had many ups and downs during the thousand and six years of its chequered existence. It sometimes displayed vast strength, at other times ludicrous weakness, so ludicrous that Voltaire declared it to be, in his day, neither Holy nor Roman nor Empire. Yet at all times the Emperor had governed not simply Germans, but other people as well; at all times the mere name of Roman Emperor carried with it the dream of dominion; and at all times this dream concealed within itself vast potential energy. A barrel of gunpowder, so long as heat is not applied, is as harmless and as passive as a barrel of sand. Yet, no sooner is it touched by a live coal than its latent potential energy becomes instantly and startlingly kinetic. There was a time, nor so remote, when Germans were regarded as amiable people addicted to fairy-tales, Christmas trees, poetry, music, metaphysics and the genial absorption of most palatable beer. The live coal of Prussian ruthlessness had not yet been hurled into the seemingly slumbering German soul. The dream of dominion was hardly suspected of existing, or seemed but a wistfully poetic looking backward to the glowing clouds of a medieval sunset. Few of those who used to listen to Berlin orchestras interpret the mighty music of Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner or the lighter strains of Waldteufel and Strauss imagined that the people who seemed to swim, entranced, in that ocean of melody and harmony, could, at a mere nod from their imperial master, spring like tigers at the throat of unsuspecting Belgium chancing to stand in their path to the conquest of the world.

Yet it is so. Prussian militarism has ignited the powder, and the placid dreamer has sprung from his bed with a madman's gleam in his eyes. So long as Germany had insufficient power to attempt the realization of her dream, that vision was but a harmless hallucination. Time was when Lessing, one of the greatest among Germans, could say that patriotism was but an amiable weakness. But, with the growth of Prussianism and the permeation of Germany with its poison, German patriotism has become a ferocious passion leading Germany through madness to destruction. Since Frederick William, the "Great Elector" of Brandenburg and Duke of Prussia, ascended the throne in 1640, Prussian policy has consistently pursued the militaristic path. Practically always, since the reign of the Great Elector, the Prussian army has been stronger than that of any other state of equal population in the world. His son, Frederick, though lacking the masterful qualities of the Great Elector, was able to demand and secure from the Emperor Leopold I, as the price of his assistance in the war of the Spanish Succession, the title of King. That title, as his famous grandson afterwards said, sowed the seed of ambition in his descendants—the ambition to build up a power commensurate with the title itself. The seed did not take long to sprout. For the second Hohenzollern who bore the title of King, Frederick William I, more than doubled the size of the army and drilled it to a point of efficiency unequalled at that time. And at his death this formidable war machine became the property of Frederick II, usually called "the Great." Great he certainly was, great as a soldier, great as an administrator, great in his iron nerve and will, but great also as a hypocrite, supremely great as a treacherous scoundrel. Just before ascending the throne he had written a book denouncing Machiavelli and deprecating ambition, conquest and greed for power. But hardly was the ink dry upon the pages of this virtuous volume when its author sprang, without a moment's warning, upon Silesia and tore it from Maria Theresa. This and his subsequent hatching of the conspiracy that led to the assassination of Poland are the two most notorious of his acts. We cannot dwell upon either these or his less known crimes.

It would be a comforting thing if those amiable people were not mistaken who tell us that right is always victorious over wrong in this world. But the grim fact is that Frederick the Greedy (as Herbert Spencer called him) was the most successful of all German robber-knights. And, since nothing succeeds like success, the terrible result is that this cynical villain is the adored idol of Germany, the model held up for statesmen and soldiers to imitate. Hear, for example, these words of Bernhardi, glorying in the base deeds of his hero: "The Great Elector laid the foundations of Prussia's power by successful and deliberately incurred wars. Frederick the Great followed in the footsteps of his glorious ancestor. . . . None of the wars which he fought had been forced upon him; none of them did he postpone as long as possible. He had always determined to be the aggressor, to anticipate his opponents, and to secure for himself favorable prospects of success."

Passing over the French revolutionary era and merely noting Mirabeau's remark that war was the chief industry of Prussia, we find that, after being well-nigh destroyed by Napoleon, she rose again in the final act of the drama and came forth from the Congress of Vienna with added territory and with a military system that was to make her stronger than ever before. In the nineteenth century Bismarck stands out as the supreme type of the Prussian, and it is worth while to recall his most famous utterance: "Not by speeches and majority votes are the great questions of the day decided, but by blood and iron." Nor were those sinister words, spoken in 1863, mere words—as the Danes, the Austrians, and the French were soon to learn. For in 1864, 1866 and 1870, respectively, he showed these three peoples by deeds what "blood and iron" meant. In 1871 the German Empire was born, and from that day to this the Prussianization of Germany has gone steadily on. Intoxicated with easy military victory, followed by prodigious economic success, the German people have surrendered their souls to Prussia and permitted her to use the school, the University, and the pulpit, as well as the drill-ground, to instill into the young the idea of German superiority to all other peoples and an insatiate lust for power. I cannot share the opinion of those who consider economic factors as the chief cause of this war. The chief cause of the cataclysm is the old dream of dominion, converted into a horrid nightmare by Prussian military arrogance and success. Germany's economic prosperity was already going forward by leaps and bounds. Her goods had free access to all British ports, and were admitted to the ports of all British colonies on precisely the same terms as British goods. Was this a reason for attacking Great Britain? No! The heaping up of riches was not enough. Germany desired to dash Russia in pieces, to crush France, to seize the British colonies, to plunder America, and to rule a far vaster world than Rome had even dreamed of ruling.

The development of this desire for domination had been fostered by few more successfully than by Heinrich von Treitschke, who, after lecturing at Kiel, Heidelberg and Freiburg in Baden, was called to Berlin about 1876 and for a score of years exercised an enormous influence that continued to broaden and deepen after he himself had passed away. For he was teaching the ablest young Germans, the men who were to go forth as teachers of History and Politics, to diffuse his ideas throughout the land. I heard him at the height of his powers, from the fall of 1883 to the spring of 1885. His appearance was imposing, and his command of language was marvelous. Many of his phrases—even whole sentences—have stuck in my memory as no other man's ever did. No lecturer under whom I studied either in this country or at the three German universities that I attended was his equal in power. Differ with him I did, frequently and vehemently; but never for one moment was he dull. All his classes were large, and one course was attended by several hundred—every seat in the large hall being occupied, while many stood—drinking in his passionate words, uttered with all the earnestness and fervor of a Hebrew prophet. Very early in his career he had declared his aim to be to propagate, by means of history, his political views. In the final word of his definition of the state is contained, as in a nutshell, the gist of his political philosophy. That definition is: "The state is the organized people as an independent and legally united power." Upon that word, power, he rang the changes in every key and in thunder tones. "The very soul and innermost being of the state," said he, "is power, and to maintain this power is the state's greatest task." "Good-natured weakness is the statesman's greatest crime." "The assertion and maintenance of its power is the first duty of the state." "The greater states have arisen not by the will of the people but by the might of the sword." "The idea of an international court of arbitration is an idle dream. War will never cease. Nor is it desirable that it should cease." "A state must have the power to assert itself in arms: else it is no state at all." "Small states are ludicrous and contemptible. For small states have no power."

Such are a few of the doctrines that I heard this man utter, but which lose, in my translation, much of their sledgehammer force. * * * Upon other peoples he poured forth hate, scorn and contempt, particularly upon the English and ourselves. "The Englishman," said he, "is a low utilitarian, a selfish islander, a hypocrite who, with a Bible in one hand and an opium-pipe in the other, diffuses throughout the universe the benefits of civilization." "We German idealists," I heard him say, "have time to meditate upon beauty; the Americans chase the dollar."

Treitschke's theory of the state as an all-engulfing power has seized hold of the German mind. In the presence of this state—this semi-divine metaphysical colossus—the individual dwindles into a pygmy cowering before the gigantic creation of his own imagination. The German, submerging his own personal identity in the state, seeks dominion, through the state, over others. The American, intelligently combining with his fellow-individuals, seeks rational freedom for himself and for them. If Prussia conquers our armies, the Prussian theory will conquer the American conception of the state, as an organization deriving its moral authority from the collective consent of intelligent individuals, will perish from the earth.

The two men who best embody the American and the Prussian ideals, respectively, are Patrick Henry and Frederick the Great. The latter, you remember, carried upon his person, during the Seven Years' War, a vial of poison—to be swallowed, if ever the time should come when his and Prussia's power must fall. Dominion or death! These were the alternatives for Frederick the Prussian. Not so for Patrick Henry the American, whose immortal words might well be adopted today as our battle-cry and that of our heroic allies: "I know not what others may say; but as for me, give me liberty, or give me death!"—Alumni Bulletin, University of Virginia.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

XII. Missionary Work: Is It Really Worth While?

If put in another form, this question might be, "The holy ministry; is it worth the while, of a bright and able young man?" There is so much which tends to blind the vision and give a negative answer to the question, and there has been such a falling off in candidates for the ministry, that this question deserves serious consideration.

Are salaries of clergy small? That of itself will not deter brave men if the cause be worthy. They who seek great money reward will look to other callings.

Only men with high motives are wanted in this holy calling. Small salaries will tend to keep out unworthy men.

But when the small salary, paid with indifference and carelessness, becomes the expression of coldness on the part of people, when resort is made to entertainments and parties to raise money to pay the clergyman's salary, that is another matter. For, in practice, this is saying, "We do not sufficiently prize the gospel of Christ to pay directly out of our own pockets what is needed for your salary." A few earnest and faithful persons may be doing what they can, but many others are lacking in deep earnestness.

And worst of all, if the clergyman should fail to please the people, he must look forward to dismissal as a mere hiring.

The young man, fresh from high school, can look forward at once to some secular occupation with good salary. Shall he spend four years in college, and three years more in a theological seminary, in order to take a life work in the ministry under such conditions as he often sees? He may with courage face the condition of small salary. But other conditions that he sees do not attract him to the ministry. It does not seem to him as worth while.

Such conditions as here described are very common. They tend to blind one's eyes as to the high and useful work of the ministry. Take large numbers of our parishes. Clergy stay but a short time. Each religious body in the town has its own resident pastor. The field of labor is really small, for the number of ministers employed is far too many; i. e., more than would be needed if Christian people were all united in one body.

In practice, what does this state of affairs say to any young man looking forward to some useful calling for a life work? Is it a useful thing to throw himself in sharp competition with other religious workers? Is it attractive to labor among people who humiliate him, and pay his salary only through entertainments and suppers? The work of the Church in many a place is self-centered. The parish cares for itself and does not look beyond. Many a person says, "I do not believe in missions. We need all the money at home." And with that selfish spirit it goes on raising and spending money on itself. If there is an appeal for money for missions, only a pittance is given.

Missionary work: Is it worth while? The parish in its practice is saying, "No."

This wrong practice, this false view, is very harmful, for the great and important work of the Church is missionary. The parish that is interested in missions is the most successful parish. The parish that gives liberally for missions does most for itself.

The great work, the chief work of the Church is missionary. See the history of the Church all down the ages. St. Paul was a great apostle, but he was a great missionary. But come down to our own days. See the work in China of Bishop Shereschewsky. A Christian college founded, the Bible translated. See his indomitable courage, with paralyzed fingers working faithfully at his task. See Livingstone in Africa, and see the results in our day following his work. See the martyred Hannington in Uganda and the wonderful changes there since wrought. See England's black Bishop, Crowther, as a boy rescued from slavery and made useful among his own race, as bishop and missionary.

Then see the work of Florence Nightingale under very trying circumstances, but with great faithfulness and courage. Then see some results in our day—the Red Cross work in this and other lands. Florence Nightingale led the way. Page after page has been written telling the deeds of great missionaries of the cross. Here is something to inspire the heart and fill the life of young men. Missionary work: is it really worth while? Here is the noblest purpose, doing good, bringing blessings to others. And this noble purpose should be placed before young men if we wish them to enter on the work of the ministry. It is the practice of the Church in our parishes, in their treatment of the men already in the ministry, that will either hinder or help young men to look forward to the work of the ministry as a life work.

See the great opportunities in this land to bring the gospel of Christ to the many sorts of people. See the foreigners of many kinds; some of them are from heathen lands, and others strongly tempted here to forsake what religion they may have had. See our work among colored people. We have done good work among Sioux and some other Indians. But some other Indian tribes are barely touched. And these various races are becoming American citizens. What a great opportunity for missionary work. And then, foreign missions. In some cases foreign nations are open to receive the gospel as never before. The great work of the Church is missionary. Viewed in the right spirit there is no grander, nobler work to be done.

It is worthy of the highest talent, the noblest effort, the fullest devotion of the heart, the greatest courage and the most complete self-sacrifice of any man or woman. And all these qualities are needed.

Missionary work; it is really worth while.

Then we appeal for workers in the Church, let this purpose be plainly put before them.

The tendency of our parish system has not been sufficiently missionary. Hence the results complained of. Remedies can be suggested. But the remedies will need to be put into practice before the beneficial results can be obtained.

CHINESE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

For the last four years the twenty-five Presbyteries in China have been united in the Presbyterian Federal Council. The question of the organization of a General Assembly including all the Presbyteries, which are the outgrowth of the mission work of various churches in this country and Great Britain, has been under consideration for some time. Nineteen of them voted for the immediate organization of the General Assembly. The other six were in favor either of delay or some modification of the proposed plan. At the recent meeting of the Federation, besides the representatives of the Presbyteries there were also present representatives of the churches of London Mission and the American Board, both Congregationalists, as we understand. They came with the request that their churches might be permitted to join in the organization of the General Assembly.

After careful consideration it was resolved to call a meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in China to meet in 1920. In the meantime those present formed themselves "into a provisional Assembly to prepare the way for the regular Assembly, and which shall continue to represent the Presbyterian Church in China, until the regular Assembly is formed."

The plan is for the Chinese Presbyterian Church to be autonomous. It will prepare its own confession of Faith and Book of Church Order, but it is generally understood that these will be based upon the standards of the churches represented by the missionaries who have built up the Chinese churches.—Exchange.

VACATION BIBLE SCHOOLS.

Seventeen years ago a young Baptist minister saw poor children in hot New York streets in July, knew there were many idle church buildings on every hand, and had been appealed to by some college students, working their way, for summer work to earn money for expenses. He applied for the use of the idle rooms. He invited the college students to come in as six weeks' teachers. And he gathered the children from the streets, and taught them Bible stories, to play games, for there is much in how one plays whether one has fun in the playing or not, and later some handicraft, with improvised tools and donated materials.

The minister in question, the Rev. R. G. Boville, is now the superintendent of a vacation Bible school system that is international in its scope, and has just closed a war summer with 75,000 children enrolled. Patriotism was the keynote of the instruction this year. There was handicraft to make articles for the Red Cross. The number of instructors, drawn largely from college students, ran into the thousands. Marked growth in schools obtained in Canada, on the Pacific Coast, and even in far off Japan. Most of the schools conducted under the name were in charge of the International Association, but wherever churches will themselves take up the conduct of schools they are encouraged to do so.

When the war came the Association, from its offices in the Bible House, New York, had appealed for an endowment and had made some progress. Immediately the war ends the endowment plan is to be proceeded with. Mr. Russell Colgate, of New York, is president of the International Association, but others in the management are among the foremost Christian leaders of the country. Everywhere the idea is endorsed. There are thousands of idle church rooms, and tens of thousands of poor children to be benefitted.

Bishop Gore to Visit America. Other Speakers in the "Moral Aims" Campaign.

During the coming fall another campaign is to be conducted on the "Moral Aims" of the war. It will be remembered that fifty-five prominent ministers and laymen toured the country during April, May and June. Through the American and British Departments of Public Information, the National Committee have arranged tours for Dr. Charles Gore, the Lord Bishop of Oxford, and Rev. A. T. Guttery, one of the leading ministers of the Primitive Methodist Church. Dr. Gore writes: "I am very keen about getting religious people of all kinds to throw themselves into pressing forward the idea of a League of Nations, leaving it, of course, to the politicians to settle the details, but asserting the principle. . . . The mere determination to be at Germany is apt to absorb all else. Whereas, in fact, we might defeat Germany and at the same time absorb so much of what is false in the spirit of the war as to defeat our professed aims in entering it." The visit of these religious leaders will do good in the broadest sense of the term. The fifty-five speakers who traversed the country from Maine to California under the auspices of the National Committee in April, May and June, addressed two hundred and seventy conferences of clergymen and two hundred and eleven popular mass meetings, aggregating 16,060 ministers and 180,000 laymen.

Announcement has just been made that an additional speaker has been secured for this campaign in the person of the Rev. Daniel Couve, a member of the French Protestant Committee of Paris. He is represented as a strong leader, a powerful and enthusiastic speaker, of a most winning personality. He is one of the leaders in Christian work and in International Christian interests in France. During the war he served in ambulance trains first, then as army chaplain, and was awarded the "Croix de Guerre" for his gallant conduct.

Conference on Armenian and Syrian Relief.

To adequately meet the needs not only in Persia, but in the entire field of Western Asia and to lay plans for a fall campaign, a conference has been called by the Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, to be held in New York, at 25 Madison Avenue, on September 19 and 20.

We are desirous of having at this conference any of our contributors

Medical Missionaries for the Red Cross, Siberia.

Dr. Claude M. Lee, medical missionary in Wushih, China, writes his father, the Rev. H. B. Lee, D. D., of Charlottesville, Va., that he and Dr. Augustus W. Tucker, of St. Luke's Hospital, Shanghai, son of Bishop Tucker of Southern Virginia, have been selected for Red Cross work in Siberia.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Aquia Church, Stafford, the Rev. Joseph Baker, rector. A gracious and valued gift has been received, a fine Mason and Hamlin organ, sweet toned and of good volume. It has this inscription: "Presented to Aquia Church, Overwharton Parish, Stafford County, Virginia, in grateful memory of a young soldier. Per Adna Ad Astra."

The year's report read last Sunday to a full congregation was encouraging. Baptisms, twenty-four; confirmations, nineteen; marriages, two; burials, sixteen; sermons, seventy-eight; Holy Communions, eleven. Average attendance, twenty-three.

The Parish House of Old Farnham Church, South Farnham Parish, Richmond County, the Rev. F. D. Goodwin, rector, which has been secured after very careful consideration and which is an important addition to the property, has lately been freshened up, painted and plastered, and has a very good Sunday-school and good congregation whenever the minister preaches there. Mrs. A. V. Payne, a teacher in the High School, is conducting the Sunday-school in the Parish House, which is also used as a chapel. The fund for the repairs on the church is growing, but very slowly. It is hoped the period after the war, when building becomes possible, will find enough money in the treasury to accomplish all work with rapidity.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomsen, D. D., Suffragan.

Emporia: Bishop Tucker visited Meherrin Parish, Emporia, the Rev. Norman F. Marshall, rector, on Sunday, August 11, confirming a class of four in Christ Church, Emporia. The offering here for general missions was about $116 in pledges, war stamps and money. Bishop Tucker told the Emporia congregation that he was proud of what they were doing for missions. This second drive within a few months for its missionary obligations, combining the very unique feature of being at the same time a drive for War Stamps, puts Christ Church, Emporia, among the banner parishes of the land in its care for the missions of the Church. It displays the value of team work in a congregation.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Darst has promised to help Bishop Guerry in his Diocese during the month of December. As recently stated in these columns, Bishop Guerry has been appointed to go to France for six months.

The Rev. C. H. Bascom, of Berlin, N. H., will have charge of St. Paul's Church, Greenville, during the Rev. George Frank Hill's absence in France as a "Y" worker.

The Rev. W. R. Noe, who has had charge of the church at Saltville, Va., during the past year has resigned and returned to Wilmington, N. C., where he became on September 1 missionary of the Wilmington Convocation.

The Rev. E. M. Parkman, who was ordained deacon by Bishop Dafst on July 14 in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Wilmington, has been placed in charge of the Aurora group of churches.

The Rev. A. R. Parshley, who entered "Y" work the beginning of the present year, and who was at the camp at Anniston, Ala., for some months, resigned in the early summer and immediately enlisted as a private, is now connected with a Hospital Unit which is at the front.

The Rev. John H. Griffith, for nearly twenty years rector of St. Mary's Church, Kinston, has resigned to accept a call to the Church of the Holy Cross, Tryon, N. C., in the District of Asheville. The resignation is effective October 15.

The Rev. T. N. Lawrence, formerly of Hertford and Plymouth, is now "overseas" engaged in Y. M. C. A. work.

The Rev. F. R. Lee, who is now one of our Diocesan Clergy, is serving as chaplain at Fort Caswell, near Southport.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

To Elect a Bishop-Coadjutor.

A Special Convention for the election of a Bishop-Coadjutor will be held in Christ Church, Nashville, on October 29, at ten o'clock in the morning.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

An Unusual Baptismal Service was held at Camp Beauregard, Alexandria, at the home of Mrs. John Gray, the widow of the Rev. John Gray, formerly a minister of this Diocese. The service was held on the lawn where Mrs. Gray had erected a large altar, with a cross of evergreens, under a beautiful tree. Chaplain W. D. Bratton, of the 155th Regiment, a son of the Bishop of Mississippi, officiated and baptized ten babies, the children of the soldiers' families, Mrs. Gray and Chaplain Bratton standing as godparents for them all.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Dr. G. G. Smeade, Archdeacon, has recently visited Camps Lee and Meade, speaking a week at each camp. In the sixteen services held he spoke to 18,000 men and had the pleasure of speaking in the great amphitheatre at Camp Meade to 7,000 negro soldiers. At the last service he spoke to 4,000 in the large auditorium. Dr.

Smeade expects to visit several camps during November and December, and will also be used by the Y. M. C. A. headquarters of New York to speak throughout the country on behalf of the one hundred million dollar fund.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Garrett, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Coadjutor.

The war bureau of the National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor has appointed the Rev. Edward Henry Eckel, rector of St. Andrew's Parish, Fort Worth, as its representative in Tarrant County, Texas. Mr. Eckel and a committee of representative citizens whom he has associated with him are co-operating with the sheriff in plans for mobilizing the county prisoners in the reclamation of waste for clothing, munitions and cannon, and in securing in conjunction with the draft boards a closer application of the work-or-fight order, especially in relation to discharged and paroled prisoners and to rejected registrants.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

The Bishop of Oxford in New York.

Through the courtesy of the National Committee of the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War, it has been arranged for the Right Rev. Charles Gore, D. D., Bishop of Oxford, to preach on Sunday, September 22nd, in the morning at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, and at Trinity Church at Evensong at 3:30 p'clock.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Bequests: In the will of the late Miss Emma Hulme, a retired teacher in the Pittsburgh public schools, and a communicant of St. Mary Memorial Chapel, who entered into rest on August 8, were bequests of $400 to each of the following institutions: St. Mary's Memorial Chapel, St. Margaret Memorial Hospital, St. Barnabas Free Home for Incurable and Convalescent Men, McKeesport, and the Church Pension Fund. The residuary estate of Miss Hulme, after the payment of some legacies to relatives and friends, is to be divided, share and share alike, amongst the four beneficiaries above mentioned.

St. Andrew's Church, Pittsburgh, and the Diocesan Church Home have received bequests of $5,000 each from the estate of Mrs. Annie Jackson Bissell, wife of Mr. F. S. Bissell. Mrs. Bissell was identified with St. Andrew's parish nearly all of her life, and for many years was President of the Board of Lady Managers of the Church Home, resigning from the position by reason of failing health.

The Every Member Canvass conducted last June in All Saints' parish, Pittsburgh, was a great success. The pledges exceeded the amounts asked for in the estimated budget, both for parish expenses and for missions, and the budget itself exceeded the total receipts for the previous year by 25 per cent. There was an increase of 105 per cent in the number of individual pledges, and of 78 per cent in the amount of money pledged last year.

The Rev. Harris B. Thomas has resigned the rectorship of Trinity Church, Rochester, to accept the position of Secretary of the War Personnel Board of the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A.

The Rev. Albert N. Slayton has resigned St. Peter's Church, Uniontown, with its adjacent missions, to accept the rectorship of St. John's Church, Charleston, W. Va.

The Rev. Isaac F. Jones, of Bellaire, Ohio, has accepted a call to the Church of the Messiah, Sheraden, with care also of St. George's Mission, West End, Pittsburgh, and will enter upon the work on October 1.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop has been having a much needed vacation at Saybrook Point, Connecticut. He returns to New Mexico the last of September.

The Rev. D. A. Sanford has had a six weeks' vacation, spent in Illinois and Wisconsin. He has now returned to Gallup, New Mexico, with the expectation, however, of taking work elsewhere in New Mexico, where his family can reside at a lower altitude.

The Rev. W. B. Magnan, who comes from Ouray, Colorado, expects to begin his work at Farmington some time this month.

The Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Jr., has accepted a call from the Bishop of New Mexico to become the head of the district of Marfa in Texas. This includes a territory of 22,000 square miles south of New Mexico and along the Rio Grande. In it are located Fort Stockton, Fort Davis, Alpine, Langford and Marfa, with important military cantonments. Mr. McClellan has made St. Paul's Church, Marfa, his headquarters.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. James B. Funsten, D. D., Bishop.

Fort Hall Indian Mission.

The Bishop reports he has just completed the rebuilding of the Fort Hall Indian Mission. The old mission was frame. The new is constructed of cement and brick, and is therefore solid and durable. The building and other improvements cost about $12,000. This mission ministers to the Shoshone and Bannocks Indians. There is a Mission School and an irrigated farm of 160 acres. The work is difficult, but most important. In completing the building the Bishop had to borrow five thousand dollars, but the rebuilding is more than justified even in these troublous times. The fire destroyed the Mission in November. The church people were not discouraged, but believed that if it was worth while to have started, it was their duty to overcome whatever difficulty they encountered. Today the work is in better shape than ever. The Indians are pleased and the missionaries are in the new home preparing to go on with work, praying that God may hasten the coming of His kingdom among the Shoshones and the Bannocks in the far away Rocky Mountain country. Any help for the building fund or furnishing will be appreciated. The house, of course, is bare; the children, too, will need clothes and shoes, for the country is often bitter cold in winter.

The Rev. L. B. Franck, rector at Twin Falls, has been doing Y. M. C. A. war work in the South, but while his people were glad to have him do his part in the cause all have at heart, he is sorely needed on the western front in Idaho, where so many vacancies are growing out of war conditions. He expects to return in October. The Bishop has requested the Rev. Mr. Franck to act in his behalf, in Virginia and the South, by devoting a short time just before he comes west to the securing certain sums of money absolutely needed for hospital and missionary work in order to prevent serious loss to the splendid work.

The Rev. Thomas Ashworth, Payette, Idaho, is now secretary of the District. All communications should be sent to him relating to the Journal of the District.

St. Margaret's School for Girls has been thoroughly renovated and is in better shape than ever before. The enrollment is the largest in its history. By being absolutely determined to make it go, by God's grace it seems to have weathered the war storm.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Mortimer S. Ashton, for ten years rector of Zion Church, Morris, N. Y., has resigned to accept the rectorship of Emmanuel Church, Corry, Pennsylvania. He will also have charge of St. Matthew's Church, Union City, and St. Peter's Church, Waterford, Pennsylvania.

The Rt. Rev. Dr. Thomas F. Davies, Bishop of Western Massachusetts, has sailed for France, where he will be until the first of the year with the American forces.

The Rev. J. F. Hamaker has resigned the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Greensboro, Ala., and accepted a call to the Church of the Holy Comforter, at Gadsden, in the same Diocese.

The Rev. F. Alan Parsons, of Ronceverte, West Virginia, has been elected rector of St. Philip's Church, Laurel, Delaware.

The Rev. Gerald Lewis, for the past two years librarian of the Church Missions House, New York, has been appointed acting rector of St. Andrew's Church, New Platz, N. Y., and will enter upon his new work October 1. Mrs. Lewis has been on the staff of the Educational Department of the General Board of Missions for four years.

The Rev. G. W. R. Cadman, rector of All Saints' Chapel, Austin, Texas, is doing hospital work in the Canadian army.

Ordinations.

On Wednesday, September 4, 1918, the Rev. Thomas Vail Wingate, B. A., was ordained priest by the Rt. Rev. Frederick Joseph Kinsman, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Delaware, in the Chapel of the Good Shepherd, Bishopstead, Wilmington. He was presented by the Ven. B. F. Thompson, Archdeacon of Delaware, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Addison A. Ewing, rector of Immanuel Church, New Castle.

In St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas, Texas, on the twelfth Sunday after Trinity, Bishop Moore ordained to the diaconate Mr. Charles G. LaBagh, who was presented by the Rev. J. Sheerin, rector of All Saints' Church, Dallas. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Carrington, Dean of St. Mary's College. Mr. LaBagh will have charge of a group of missions at Hamilton, Meridian and Dublin, Texas.

In St. James Church, Cleveland, N. Y. (Diocese of Central New York) on June 24, Bishop Olmsted advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Samuel Flagler Burhans, who has been in charge of St. James for some time. The Rev. Ernest C. Tuthill presented the candidate and the Bishop preached the sermon.

In Christ Church, Little Rock, Arkansas, on Sunday, August 25, Lieutenant Douglas Bagwell Leatherbury, of the Second Training Regiment, Camp Pike, was ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, Suffragan-Bishop of Arkansas, at the request of the Bishop of Tennessee. The candidate was presented by the Rev. C. F. Collins, civilian chaplain at Camp Pike, who also preached the sermon. Lieutenant Leatherbury was sent to Camp Pike last June in the draft from his district only a few days before the time set for his ordination at the University of the South. Since that time he has been constantly promoted, and received a commission as second lieutenant three weeks ago.

Deaths.

The Rev. William H. Vibbert, D. D., for more than fifty years a prominent clergyman and Vicar Emeritus of Trinity Chapel, New York City, died recently at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Frederick W. Keasbey, Morristown, N. J., aged seventy-eight years. The funeral was held at Trinity Chapel and interment was made at St. Luke's Church, Germantown, Pa.

The New Perspective.

Many lives have no purpose at all. Multitudes merely drift from their first conscious years to the end. All notable lives, whether on the broad stage of public affairs, or in the narrow sphere of a humble community, are swayed by a definite purpose. But the man who has passed into the new life has his purpose made single, and finds it baptized into an unselfish nobility. He is given new thoughts, and he sets new values upon neglected things. What he once hungered after, the favors for which he fawned upon men, and endured their contumely, over which he dreamed in his brooding hours, are seen in their transiency and pettiness. He builds the faith which once he destroyed. He restores fourfold what he once took away. Every man, however feebly this new energy has begun to beat within him, finds himself living with a new purpose.—W. M. Clow.

You cannot bring love and need together without having the cross. This is true in human life. It is true in the home. It is true with society. It is true in the nation. It is the glorious truth exemplified by the Allies today. Love of righteousness, face to face with human need, is the only possible explanation of the sacrifice France, Britain, Italy, America are making at this time. The only way you can get rid of the cross is to deny that "God is Love," or that man is in need. Admit these facts and the cross is inevitable.—John McDowell.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Making peace is going to be almost as great a task as making war. When our munition factories close, leaving hundreds of thousands of employees without work, and at the same time our boys begin to return from France, looking for a better occupation than that of killing Germans, the strain upon economic conditions in this country and throughout the world will be greater than it is possible to realize.

Secretary Lane, of the Interior Department, is already planning to meet these conditions. His scheme is to provide a forty-acre farm for each soldier. This farm to be carved out of land which is now useless, either on account of too much or too little water. In the one case the land will have to be irrigated and large dams and dikes will be necessary. In the other, the land is at present mostly swamps and great drainage operations will have to be carried out. The idea is that in both cases the returning soldiers can be employed by the government in preparing their own future homes. The plan being to have each man make a small payment for his land and continue these payments during his employment, and while the work is being done for the government.

These small farms will offer wonderful opportunities for the development of rural community life.

This small acreage will enable their owners to enjoy the social intercourse of town and cities and avoid the isolation and loneliness which drives so many of our young people to leave their country homes.

Of course, the houses that will be built for our veteran farmers will have all modern heating, lighting and sanitary arrangements, so that life upon these farms will be vastly pleasanter than the old time drudgery of the average small farms of to-day and of the recent past.

In this direction Australia is far ahead of us, and has already established a Department of Repatriation, whose head is a certain member.

The Survey of August 17 gives us the following interesting information on this subject:

"Dr. Elwood Mead, chairman of the Land Settlement Board of the State of California, has been appointed by Secretary Lane to assist in formulating a national policy for colonizing returned soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces. It is understood that the plan for such provision has the consent of President Wilson, and that an appropriation of about a million dollars is available with which to begin the work. Before taking up his work in California, Dr. Mead has been instrumental in settling several thousand families upon the state colonies of Victoria and New South Wales."

At Last.

It now seems certain that all breweries will be closed after December 1.

As a consequence a great wall is going up about its cutting government revenues by $400,000,000, which, no doubt, is true, but careful estimators have calculated that the new revenue bill will produce a billion dollars more than the desired eight billion that is needed.

To-day, however, money is not so hard to get in the United States as fuel and food, so let us remember and emphasize the fact that closing the breweries will save grain enough to make 5,000,000 loaves of bread a day throughout the year.

More gratifying still is the fuel saved by this step, which has been so long delayed. According to official reports in 1917 brewers used (or rather misused) more than 3,000,000 tons of coal.

Justice is Better Than Charity.

The following item of news comes from Washington:

"A uniform compensation insurance and pension plan for all railroad employees is under consideration.

"Plans for the uniform and equitable compensation of injured employees or the dependents of employees who may be skilled in the service of the railroads are being considered," said an official announcement to-day, "and it is hoped that it may also be possible to arrange for the retirement of employees upon pension at a given age as well as to provide for their purchase of life, health and old-age insurance at reasonable rates. Time will, however, be required to perfect these plans, which must be reconciled with the widely varying pensions and insurance systems now in existence on not a few of the railroads."

Railroad employees are usually better paid than any other kind of labor.

If old age retirement pensions are advisable and necessary for them, how much more so are they a necessity for other laborers, especially unskilled workers, who can rarely save enough to provide for their old age.

The Church has always been active as a dispenser of charity. Is it not time that it should take a step forward and exert its influence in a preventive way to bring about conditions that will prevent the need for charity.

One of our Bishops in preaching from the text, "Seek ye first the kingdom and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you," recently said, "Industrialism may become as cruel as militarism."

One great function of the Church of to-day (and of to-morrow) should be to guard against the cruelties of industrialism, and one of the most effective methods is the advocacy of old age pension and disability insurance systems, not only for railroad employers but for every other class of workers.

Scholarships For Social Workers.

Richmond, Va., Sept. 1.—To encourage Southern women to enter social work as a profession the School of Social Work and Public Health in Richmond is offering to duly qualified women four scholarships of $150.00 in amount. These scholarships were provided to encourage enough women to enter social work immediately to fill the great number and variety of positions which the war has brought forth. One of the scholarships is offered by the United Daughters of the Confederacy.

Social work offers many advantages that should appeal to the women of the South. While it requires the existence of the missionary spirit and while a belief and fervent exposition of the teachings of religion are necessary, this spirit of service will not be exploited. The workers will be paid adequate salaries.

The course will open October 1. Full information about this and the scholarships will be sent upon application to the director of the school in Richmond.

The Enlargement of the Family Kitchen.

On all sides we are meeting with proofs of the Saviour's statement that we are all brethren and the children of one Father.

In the old days a family was almost a little world in itself. The following clipping is one example of the way that the whole world is becoming one family:

LONDON, September 7.—The only self-serve restaurant in London, recently opened, is run by the government. But British methods, and not American, prevail.

Just inside the door is a half-moon counter, where two women sell tickets from a reel, something after the order of certain American movie strip-tickets. The tickets are of various denominations—penny ones, tuppence, thruppence, etc. A person estimates how hungry he is and buys tickets in proportion. A sign suspended from the ceiling reads: "To the counter." You go that way, seeing other signs reading: Puddings, fish, soup, meat, vegetables. No line is formed, the customers being grouped about the counter in haphazard manner. You get a tureen of vegetable soup at four cents and the waitress collects a ticket and spikes it. You find a seat and finish the soup. Then you are ready to do some more self-serving, repeating the process to get roast beef at twelve cents (two ounces), salad at six cents and bread and butter at two cents. For each article you go to a different waitress, who collects the proper amount of

Sixteenth Sunday After Trinity: With part of the first Sunday morning lesson we are familiar as one of the Prayer Book Old Testament lessons for Palm Sunday, viz., verses 9 ff: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion * * * Behold thy King cometh unto thee, etc.," a use from which the New Lectionary does not depart. Why, then, it may well be asked, should this chapter of Zechariah be also used on this sixteenth Sunday after Trinity? The answer is that the closing chapters of Zechariah, from the ninth on, are essential to an understanding of the Greek period of Jewish history, on which we are now entering in the Old Testament Historical course. There is difference of opinion between traditionalists and the moderns as to when these chapters were written; whether by Zechariah himself and addressed to the remnant that returned from Babylon, as the first eight chapters unquestionably were; or whether they were written by a later prophet or prophets in connection with the conquests of Alexander the Great and the persecutions under Antiochus Epiphanes. For lectionary purposes, fortunately, we need not decide this controversy. The meaning of Zechariah, chapters IX to XIV, is the same on either supposition. For instance, Scofield, holding to the traditional view of authorship, says on this chapter: "There seems to be a reference here to the advance and return of Alexander the Great after the battle of Issus, who subdued the cities mentioned in verses 1-6." And certainly the great prophecy of the true King is made much more impressive if viewed against the background of the mighty conqueror who "bestrode the world like a Colossus" and rode, not upon "an ass, even a colt the foal of an ass," signifying both peace and lowly service, but upon a horse, symbol of war and whose very name (Bucephalus) has come down to us; just as we may contrast the entry into Jerusalem in recent times of General Allenby with that of the vain-glorious Kaiser. For the corresponding second lesson we have given, not the (so-called) Triumphant Entry of the Christ, but the latter part of the same chapter with the account of the Greeks who would see Jesus, which accords most wonderfully with the predicted clash between Jews and Greeks (Zech. 9:13 ff) which came to pass during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. The modern form of this same antagonism is that between faith and mere intellectualism (Cf. Davidson, Education of Greek People). In the prophecy of victory with which the section concludes, there is a close connection with the petition of the Collect that God would cleanse and defend His Church. The evening lessons reveal, first, unseen spiritual forces on the side of God's Church and of right (prayed for in Collect), and next, Christ as Lord of life and of death, leading up to the ever-present "Resurrection and (spiritual) life," combining the Resuscitation of the son of the widow of Nain in the Gospel with the might of the indwelling Spirit in the Epistle. The second lesson, however, it must be confessed, is much too long. Perhaps verses 1-27 would suffice. In its place might be read Monday's lesson, Luke 10:1-24. The continued reading of Zechariah (week days) is for reasons given above. We are accustomed to think of the Bible as ending with Malachi, followed by four hundred years of silence; but if we would understand this so-called "Inter-Biblical Period," we must fill that blank in not only with Proverbs, Ecclesiasticus and Maccabees, but also with the second halves, respectively, of Zechariah and of Daniel.

O Lord, we beseech Thee, let Thy continual pity cleanse and defend Thy Church; and, because it cannot continue in safety without Thy succour, preserve it evermore by Thy help and goodness; through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

Life.

We ask the question, "What is Life?"
In childhood's happy years,
Before life's strange bewilderments
Bring us our doubts and fears.

Ah, "what is life" one well may ask
Not only when in youth,
But after quickly passing years
Bring home the bitter truth

That life to many on this earth
Means only sin and strife;
They know not gentleness or love,
Their selfish lusts are rife.

And when upon the seats of power
Such beings hold the sway,
Unto the nations, weak and strong,
They bring an evil day.

To such a day have we now come
Here in this land of ours,
For in the cause of truth and right,
We can but join the Powers

That struggle fiercely, as with death,
Their very lives to save
From the outrageous cruel hate
Of those who all power crave.

Yet many dark days in the past
Have come unto this earth,
And after each, the sun once more
Hath shone in added worth.

The dreadful blackness that didst mark
The death of God's great Son
Was not allowed to last away;
His work was not then done.

Again He walked upon the earth
In likeness as before;
The darkness gone, the sun streamed forth,
The flowers bloomed as of yore.

So even in this tragic day,
When all the world has come
Into another cloud of gloom,
When pain has left us numb,

Let us remember that this world
Is not the end of all;
Our struggling life upon this earth;
With every bruising fall,

Is but a chance for us to serve
The higher life within,
And daily battle with ourselves
To conquer every sin.

When this is done, we then may know
The fullness of His grace;
And when our life on earth is o'er,
Shall meet Him face to face.

Each in His Own Tongue.

A, fire mist and a planet,
A crystal and a cell,
A jelly-fish and a saurian,
And a cave where the cave-men dwell;
Then a sense of law and beauty,
A face turned from the clod—
Some call it Evolution
And others call it God.

A haze on the fair horizon,
The infinite, tender sky,
The ripe, rich tint of the corn-fields,
And the wild geese sailing high—
And all over upland and lowland
The sign of the golden-rod—
Some of us call it Autumn
And others call it God.

Like tides on a crescent sea-beach,
When the moon is new and thin,
Into our hearts high yearnings
Come welling and surging in—
Come from the mystic ocean,
Whose rim no foot has trod—
Some of us call it Longing
And others call it God.

A picket frozen on duty,
A mother starved for her brood,
Socrates drinking the hemlock,
And Jesus on the rood;
And millions who, humble and nameless,
The straight, hard pathway trod—
Some call it Consecration
And others call it God.

For the Southern Churchman. Mrs. Hobbs—Her Mark.

Mrs. Hobbs accompanied her visitor to the door with perfect politeness but with a trace of coldness, also. "So that's where I stand," she reiterated. "I'm perfectly willing to accommodate you, Agatha, in most things, but this is almost a matter of principle with me. I've said from the first that I didn't expect to sign one of those conservation cards. An honest man's word is as good as his bond, as the old saying goes, and you may have my word for it I'm going to be thrifty and economical as the best of them. For that matter, I've never been anything else. I'll even go so far as to say that I don't expect to use a dust more of flour than that card stipulates—but I can't sign."

She paused for breath, and Miss Agatha Bird opened her mouth to speak. Her hostess forestalled her. "As I say, an honest man's word—"

Miss Agatha broke in timidly. "But it's not a question of honesty, you see."

"No, I don't see," the other said, flatly. "I'd just as soon agree to write 'Louisa Hobbs is a patriot' and stick it up on the posts and trees. I can do my part by the government without plastering notices in my windows. You musn't feel hurt, Agatha. It's just a matter of principle with me."

Miss Agatha, who was trustful-eyed and mild of manner, pocketed her list of names and sighed. "I wish I knew how to argue," she thought, "but I can't think of a thing to answer back." She trailed her long skirts down the walk and turned reluctantly at the gate to head for the next door neighbor's. Somehow, Mrs. Hobbs had shaken her confidence in her morning's mission.

That night at the supper table Mrs.

Hobbs gave her family a brief account of the incident. The children looked puzzled and disappointed. Mr. Hobbs set down his cup of coffee and leaned back.

"Well, I don't know," he said, doubtfully. "A blank window will look like we're out of sympathy with things."

Mrs. Hobbs began to clear away the dishes. "People set too much store by appearances," she declared. "John, have you finished collecting the minister's salary for this quarter?"

"Almost," Mr. Hobbs replied. "Struck a snag in old Mr. Morrow, though. His memory's failing, you know, and he beats me down he never agreed to pay ten a year; says he's paid five ever since he paid anything."

"So he did, till last year, but we persuaded him then to double his subscription. John Hobbs, do you mean to tell me that you failed to put his name down for ten? The truth is, you should have made him sign for it himself, knowing that he can't keep anything in his head an hour at a time."

Mr. Hobbs squirmed. "I plumb forgot to register him," he confessed. "It'll have to come out of my own pocket."

The extra ten dollars was buzzing in Mrs. Hobbs' brain when she set forth the next morning to arrange for the Red Cross bazaar, of which she was chairman. But her resentment toward the careless Mr. Hobbs was somewhat soothed by the thought of her own errand. "I'll not go home until I have every worker appointed and every contribution promised," she said to herself. Her thoughts ran on complacently. "The heaviest end of this entertainment has fallen on me. Who's to say that Louisa Hobbs ain't ready to do her part in helping to win the war?"

Her task went smoothly until nearly noon. With a note book in one hand and a sharpened pencil in the other, she pushed briskly from house to house, interviewing her townswomen and listing them for the bazaar work. She found out also what special contribution might be counted on from each home, and made a careful note of it. Everybody was willing and cheerful. "There's nothing like co-operation and system!" Louisa Hobbs told herself with satisfaction.

It was not until toward the end of the morning that she encountered difficulty. Her step lagged a little as she went up the gravel walk to Mrs. Emmett Plummer's rather pretentious front door. Mrs. Plummer, fretful, self-centered, and a little given to "airs," always got on her nerves.

"Her dining-room looks kind of different," Mrs. Hobbs thought. "Some new-fangled notion about going without curtains, I s'pose." Then she looked again. "No, there are the curtains. I know now—it's the lack of one of those conservation cards." She cleared her throat. "Well, I s'pose I've seen so many of 'em this morning that a window without one looks like a hole in a wall."

Mrs. Plummer was headachy and a little querulous. When the visitor produced her two papers she put out a deprecating hand. "What, now?" she said.

"I'm signing up the Red Cross bazaar workers and contributions," Mrs. Hobbs replied, stiffly. "I'm sorry your head aches, Mrs. Plummer, but it won't take a minute for you to let me know just what you'll do, that afternoon, and what I may count on you to send." She was a good deal surprised; Mrs. Plummer was frequently difficult to deal with, but at least she was always eager and pleased at the prospect of having her hand in church and social matters. The visitor waited with pencil poised.

Mrs. Plummer made a gesture. "I'd rather not commit myself definitely to anything," she said. "You know perfectly well that I'll do my share of the work when I get there and that I'll be sure to bring a contribution. Have I ever failed you?"

Mrs. Hobbs still held her pencil in the air; her surprise increased. "No. But—"

"Well, let it go at that," said Mrs. Plummer. "I can be of just as much use without being written down in black and white three days ahead of time. The truth is—"

She interrupted herself to lean over with a pleasant air of mystery. "I've decided that this signing business is being fairly run into the ground!"

She sat back with a knowing nod. In the recesses of Mrs. Hobbs' mind a bell tinkled, as it were, with a familiar sound. But she turned her attention earnestly to the matter in hand. "Now, look here, Mrs. Plummer," she said, trying to keep down her exasperation, "suppose everybody refused to commit themselves, as you call it—"

"I'm not supposing about what other people do," Mrs. Plummer put in with complacency, "I'm merely speaking for Carrie Plummer."

Mrs. Hobbs attacked from another angle. "This is the systematic, practical way to do," she said. "People will forget, sometimes, and anyway, the chairman likes to feel sure of a good backing."

Mrs. Plummer was unmoved. "I can do my part for the Red Cross bazaar without being signed up for it ahead of time," she declared. "An honest man's word is as good—"

"This hasn't got anything to do with honesty!" the other burst out. Then she caught herself up suddenly. The bell had tinkled again in her memory. For a moment she forgot the matter in hand.

Mrs. Plummer began to rock. "This idea has been forming in my mind for some time," she said. "Then, yesterday, Agatha Bird came around with that conservation business, and she looked so big-eyed and plaintive that I decided to go ahead and sign without any ado. But she let it slip out that she hadn't had altogether smooth sailing. It seems (though I couldn't get any names out of her) that somebody else in this town feels the same way that I do. That encouraged me to stick by my guns. For it's a matter of principle with me, really!"

There was a short silence, then Mrs. Plummer laughed. "You needn't sit there and look at me with that petrified expression, Louisa Hobbs. I mean what I say. I'm going out now and get you some of the chocolate cake I made for tea—before I remembered about saving sugar. When you've tasted that cake you'll forgive me for being what you're plainly calling a crank."

She was gone for quite awhile, and after she came back the subject languished. Then, as the caller was leaving, apparently in a brown study, Mrs. Plummer began again. "Don't bother about going to Lucy Starr," she advised. "I was talking to her yesterday while Agatha was across the street, and she agreed with me. Said she never had looked at the matter in that light before, but that sure enough it didn't seem right to pledge yourself like that, when life is so uncertain. You know Lucy's conscience."

Mrs. Hobbs shut the gate heavily and turned back the way she had come. At the corner she nearly collided with Miss Agatha Bird. They both stopped short, and Agatha began to flutter. "Oh, you've been to see Lucy Starr and Mrs. Plummer about the bazaar," she faltered. "But I'm afraid—they—I—." She paused stricken.

"Don't look so much like a hurt pigeon, Agatha," said Mrs. Hobbs, briskly but not unkindly. She had given herself a mental shake. "Lucy Starr'll come around, probably. Lots of people do, when they find they're mistaken. Louisa Hobbs, for instance. Carrie Plummer's just been persuading me that an honest man's bond, while no better than his word, may be a little more convenient and business-like."

"Mrs. Plummer?" Agatha's mild eyes almost protruded.

"In her way," Mrs. Hobbs replied briefly. "If you have your conservation paper handy now, Agatha, I might as well sign."

That night Mr. Hobbs commented with pleasure on the neat appearance of the card in his window. Evidently, with an easy-going man's short memory he had quite forgotten the incident of the night before. After a hearty supper he imparted a piece of good news with satisfaction. "I landed old man Morrow's subscription," he said. "Nudged his recollection till it all came back to him. Folks will lose sight of things, you know. You were right about signatures being important, Louisa."

His wife glanced at him sharply, but his face was guileless. It was plain that only half of last night's conversation had remained in his mind.

"I reckon you always are right, eh, old lady?" he quizzed, with heavy jocularly. "How about it?"

Mrs. Hobbs parted the curtains and looked out into the night over the edge of her new conservation card. "Sometimes," she admitted, "but I wouldn't say always, exactly."

Suspicion.

When Ellen Cardell went up the steps to Mrs. Bruce's door her face was red with vexation, and the angry tears were starting in her eyes.

"Oh, Mrs. Bruce, I'm the loneliest, most unhappy girl in Greenwood!"

Mrs. Bruce looked at her calmly. "I noticed you coming along the street," she said. "Let me see; wasn't it Alma Norcross that passed you just before you got the house?"

Ellen looked up with eyes blazing through her tears. "Don't mention her name to me! She has treated me dreadfully, and deserted me—just like all the rest."

Undisturbed, Mrs. Bruce went on: "I noticed that you didn't speak to Alma, though she turned toward you and tried to attract your attention. What is it that she has done?"

"It was something that she didn't do. When Aunt Martha died, she never mentioned it, nor spoke one word of sympathy."

Mrs. Bruce turned her head to hide a faint smile. "Your Aunt Martha—?"

"Yes! Aunt Martha Raymond at Stamford."

"I see. And was Alma acquainted with her?"

"No, of course not; but she has heard me talk about her hundreds of times, and knew how much I loved her."

"Did you tell Alma about your loss?"

"No-no; but it was in the Tribune."

"Are you sure that Alma saw it?"

"Mrs. Bruce"—Ellen's eyes began to flash again—"what are you asking me all these questions for?"

"Just be patient, dearie; I've got a few more, and then you'll see. How long have you known Alma?"

"Ever since we were little children; but what—"

"And in all that time did you ever know Alma to be thoughtless or unsympathetic before? Wasn't it Alma who came to see you every day, and read to you, and cheered you up when you were getting over that long illness last summer?"

There were tears in Ellen's eyes again; but now they were not angry ones. "Yes, yes," she said, quickly; "but I thought—"

"That's it, Ellen," Mrs. Bruce spoke earnestly. "You 'thought,' and you let that suspicion overbalance all the years of Alma's faithful friendship. Is that fair? And is Alma the only friend you have treated in that way? Don't you suppose that is the reason why you are the loneliest girl in Greenwood?"

Ellen started up quickly. "Look, Mrs. Bruce," she cried, "there comes Alma now! Do you suppose, if I told her how ashamed of myself I am—I'm going to try it, anyway." And Ellen ran to the door, calling: "Alma! Alma!" And in a minute or two Mrs. Bruce saw the two girls walking happily along together.—Girls' World.

For the Southern Churchman. The Birth of Peace.

Margaret Moore, Wilmington, N. C.

The time was ripe.
Men yearned for peace,
Trembling in the shadow of grim war.

Men yearned for peace!
And some, who thought that haply peace had come,
Even reared a palace to the same, and called it Peace.

But others wept, who knew
That such a gift could only be divine,
And daily they on bended knee did cry,
"Give peace in our time, O Lord!"

And straightway Peace began to be.
The word breathed softly o'er the dormant seed.
The world sprang pregnant, joyous to become
The mother of the young child, Peace.

But such a gift could not be given
To a world unpurified—
To a world untried, indifferent, cold,
For whom Christ died.

Sore was the travail, all humankind convulsed
In direful strife, and faint from war's alarms,
Hearts filled with doubt and fear,
And eyes with tears grown dim—

Unseeing the Physician standing there,
Watchful and firm to give the child complete
And strong into its waiting mother's arms.

For the Southern Churchman. FAMILIAR HYMNS.

XIII. Blest Be the Tie That Binds.

If it were possible to know the life history of different poems we would doubtless be surprised to find how many of our favorite hymns had their origin in some little homely experience of daily living. "Blest Be the Tie That Binds" is one of these. In one respect it stands in a class by itself; somewhat broader than the personal, meditative hymn, and somewhat narrower than the more distinctly congregational hymn, it seems distinctly made for a little loving circle of friends and acquaintances—a few hearts that have been intimately bound together in some phase of this transient life.

It was written under the following circumstances: About a hundred and fifty years ago, a Baptist minister, Dr. John Fawcett, found himself on the eve of resigning his small country pastorate and moving up to London to take charge of a rich and promising field. The household goods were all packed and ready, and the furniture vans at the door, when his devoted parishioners gathered in a body to bid him farewell. There followed a scene of grief and regret so touching—nay, so overwhelming—that the minister's purpose bent, then broke. Turning to his weeping people he said, "I will not go. Unpack my goods. We will live for the Lord lovingly together."

It is not recorded that he ever regretted his decision; what is recorded is the plaintive, tender, heart-searching hymn that was born of that hour.

Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Jesus' love;
The fellowship of Christian minds
Is like to that above.

Before our Father's throne
We pour united prayers;
Our fears, our hopes, our aims are one,
Our comforts and our cares.

We share our mutual woes,
Our mutual burdens bear,
And often for each other flows
The sympathizing tear."

When we at death must part,
Not like the world's our pain;
But one in Christ and one in heart
We part to meet again.

From sorrow, toil and pain,
And sin we shall be free;
And perfect love and friendship reign
Throughout eternity.

Good Resolutions.

I will not speak evil of any one.
I will not criticize any person against whom I am prejudiced.
I will restrain my tongue when I am angry.

I will be silent when I know there is danger of being misunderstood.
I will withhold my words when I have a doubt as to my motive in speaking.

I will not be a "tale-bearer." I will not tell or repeat anything that will make unkind feelings between people or that will create prejudice.

I will not try to hear unkind or wrong things, and will do all in my power to discourage those who indulge in unkind words.

I will cultivate a habit of placing a charitable construction upon the words and conduct of my fellows.

I will do all in my power to help the weak, the erring and the distressed.

I will cultivate a habit of placing thought and expression in all my relations in life.

I will be clean in my words.
Believing that every one has some good quality or qualities. I will look for the good and emulate it, and when

I find evil I will pray that its possessor may be delivered from its power.

In all things I will aspire to "Walk in the Spirit," that I may not fulfil the lusts of the flesh.—Banner.

The Love That Gives.

Instinctively we recognize the truth of the Master's words, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

Life is an exceedingly precious thing. How tenaciously we cling to it! It is a prize which no rational person will lightly throw away. A man will go to great lengths to save his life. He will practice the most rigid precautions for its preservation. When he voluntarily gives his life for his friends, when he sacrifices himself for others, we say that love can show nothing better than that.

We are having some magnificent illustrations of this fact just now. In the fearful battle that is now raging across the seas, men are dying by the tens of thousands for the sake of ideals, for the good of their friends, for the honor of the homeland, in behalf of generations yet unborn. Never in the world's history have there been finer examples of willing sacrifice for love of the things that men hold dear.

It has been said that it will not be difficult by the time this war is closed to understand the doctrine of the atonement. Surely the agonies and sufferings that are being experienced remind men of the Great Sacrifice. Christ died not only for His friends, but for those who were leagued against Him, who hated Him and persecuted Him and drove Him to the cross. What love is like unto that love?

The Master asks us to take up the cross and follow Him. He calls us to the sacrificial life. If ever there was a time when this life was needed for the good of the world, that time is now. The fate of Christian civilization is trembling in the balance. If the world is to be made safe for democracy, and democracy is to be made safe for the world, if the race is to attain to those heights of moral grandeur and spiritual accomplishment which God points out to us, then there is absolute necessity that good men and good women shall dedicate themselves body and soul to the service of their Lord.

The first casualty lists have recently appeared in our papers. In all probability they will be greatly lengthened in the days to come. They will bring home to our minds and hearts with increasing emphasis the stern fact that a great price must be paid in defending high ideals, in putting down tyranny, in developing the spiritual life of our own people and of the other peoples of the world.

It is the hour for committing ourselves anew to the Saviour in a more complete dedication of life than we have yet experienced. Whatever service is required of us in this crucial hour, let us render it with the full strength of loving hands and loving hearts. Whatever sacrifice is necessary, let it be given in the blessed assurance that we are following the Great Master of life.—The United Presbyterian.

What is rightly regulated love but moral power of the highest order? As St. Paul puts it, "The love of Christ constraineth us." Love is the very muscle and fibre of moral force.—Canon Liddon.

A Frown and a Smile.

Such a silly little, foolish little, naughty little frown—

Too small to do the slightest harm, you'd think,

Yet the naughty little frown frowned the nursery pleasure down,

And made a pleasant room as black as ink.

Nurse scolded—Jamie sighed—

Kitten ran and baby cried—

(You scarcely can believe it, but it's true) Every smile was blotted out

With that naughty frown about—

Just think how much a little frown can do!

Such a pleasant little, happy little, jolly little smile—

Too small to do the slightest good you'd say,

Yet that happy little smile kept the nursery all the while

As cheerful as the sunshine, and as gay.

Nurse was singing like a bird—

Baby cooed and kitten purred—

(You scarcely can believe it, but it's true) Everywhere that small smile went

It brought pleasure and content—

Just think how much a little smile can do!

The Exaggerator.

"I'm most dead. It's hot as fire, and I've been over a dozen miles after that colt." Andrew threw himself at full length on the lounge and wiped the perspiration from his forehead.

"Where did you go?" inquired the father.

"I went over to Briggs' and back by the bridge."

"That is a little less than a mile, is it so warm, Andy? It seems quite cool here."

"No, not quite so dreadful if I'd taken it moderate; but I ran like lightning and got heated up."

"You started about five o'clock, Andy, and it is now a quarter to six," said his father, consulting his watch.

"Yes, sir; just three-quarters of an hour," answered Andrew innocently.

"Does it take lightning forty-five minutes to go half a mile?"

"I didn't mean exactly that, father; but I ran all the way because I expected the whole town would be here to-night to see my new velocipede," answered Andrew reluctantly.

"Whom did you expect, son? I was not aware that such a crowd was to be here. What will you do with them all?"

"Jim, Eddie, Tim and Sam told me they'd be around after school, and I shouldn't wonder if Ike, too; that's all."

"The population of the town is about five thousand, and you expect five persons. Well, as you are very sick, I am glad no more are coming. You couldn't play with them at all."

"Sick!" cried Andrew, springing to his feet. "Who says I am sick?"

"Why, my son, you said when you came in you were almost dead. Does not that mean very sick?"

"You are so very particular, father, about my talking. I don't mean exactly what I say, of course. I was not nearly dead at all; but I did some tall running, you bet. There were about fifty dogs after me, and I don't go much on dogs."

"Quite a band of them! Where did they all come from?"

"There was Mr. Wheeler's sheep dog, and Rush's store dog, and two or three more, and they made for me, so I ran as fast as I could."

"Five at the most. That is not fifty, Andy."

"There looked to be fifty, anyway," answered Andrew, somewhat impatiently. "Carter's ten-acre lot was full of dogs just making for me; and I guess you'd thought there were fifty if it had been you."

"Ten acres of dogs would have been many thousands; have you any idea how many?"

Andrew did not like to calculate, so he only shook his head.

But his father continued: "I know no better way to break you of the habit of exaggerating than to tell the children of the trouble you had in going after the colt. You ran like lightning, encountered ten acres of dogs, traveled more than a dozen miles to get half a mile; expected five thousand people here to examine your new velocipede, and when you reached home you were nearly dead."

"Please, don't father; the boys and girls will laugh themselves to death."

"Laugh themselves to death at a simple story like this? I hope not."

"But, father, I will never stretch things again if you will not tell them," pleaded Andrew.

"I hope not, my child, for it will finally cost you the faith of all your hearers. Nobody relies upon the word of one who is given to habitual exaggeration. State things just as they are. Habit grows with years and becomes in time so deeply rooted that it will be impossible for you when you become a man to relate plain, unvarnished truths unless you check the foolish habit in which you indulge of stretching simple incidents into most marvelous tales."—Western Christian Advocate.

How Dolls Can Make Dollars.

Did you ever think that dolls can do good just like people? Well, I just want to tell you about our missionary dolls.

Our Junior Mission Band meets every two weeks, and we have a new doll to meet with us every time. One time it will be a foreign missionary and the next time a home missionary doll, and one time a boy and the next a girl, because we have fourteen boys and fourteen girls in our society. Our leader is a lady whom they call the "Secretary of Young People's Work" in our Church. Last year she had our sand table every time, and we did enjoy that. She made houses out of cardboard; and some of them were very curious, especially the Filipino houses standing upon stilts and the little African huts too. She had cut out wild animals and the Jack and Janet paper dolls. We learned lots about how all the people live in our Foreign Mission fields, and we enjoyed every meeting.

But this year we are having large, unbreakable dolls dressed in full costume, and we "play like" they are real children, and we name them and learn all about the school they go to and the missionaries they live with. After we have learned about each doll, she takes our offering that day and sends it directly to that place, and we always get a nice letter of thanks in reply, and then we are delighted, for it brings it all so near and real to us. Our first meeting was about the Indians. We had such a pretty Indian girl, with feathers and beads, etc.; and we played like she lived at the Goodland Orphanage, at Goodland, Okla. We learned about how eager the Indians are to hear the gospel and how they like Presbyterianism because our services are quiet and dignified. We gave $2.75 that day and sent it to Goodland; and we have the nicest letter from Mrs. Gibbons, who says that they will put our money into a new cottage they are building for the little orphan Indian boys. She suggests that we name our doll "Ulla Homa," which means in the Choctaw language "Red Child."

Another doll we had was an African doll. He is the "genuine article," with kinky hair and a shell hung round his neck for a "fetish." Our leader gave each one of us a tiny shell on a cord to wear home, and we felt that we wanted to do something to help those children who were so superstitious and ignorant as to believe in a "fetish." We pretend that our little African is a playmate of little Motte Martin, Jr. We had a mite box opening at this meeting, and our offering was $5. Our leader explained to us that as our Sunday-school was observing the "seven-year plan" for Foreign Missions and that last year it was for our Congo Mission, we voted to send our money directly to the Executive Committee; and we have a nice letter of thanks from Nashville expressing the "cordial thanks and appreciation of the Committee" there.

Our Japanese doll is beautiful. She is a French doll loaned to us by one of the big girls. She has real hair, done up high on her head, and wears a beautiful Japanese kimono with big sleeves that are regular pockets and hold her fan and other things. We have named her "Tainuchi Fumi San." She is a real Japanese girl who was adopted by Miss Maria Atkinson at Takamatsu. We get letters all the time from Miss Atkinson; and Fumi San has sent us her photograph, written to us in her queen little way, and sent us a water-color picture which she painted herself. She goes to school at the Nagoya Girls' School.

One of the dolls we love best, though, is our mountain boy, with his overalls and big straw hat. Our pastor's wife has a friend who is a home missionary in the Kentucky mountains. She is Miss Fannie Robbins, at Canyon Falls, Ky., and she has adopted a little mountain boy named Paul; so our doll is Paul, too. We sent her $1.25 for him; and she wrote us that he wanted to buy candy, but she persuaded him that he needed overalls. We have learned about that wonderful man, Dr. Guernant, and we love our little mountain "cousin," who has just as pure American blood as we have.

Our little Chinaman is too cute for anything. His name is John, because we know and love little John Stuart, of Nanking, China. He visited us with his mother and father, Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Stuart, two years ago; and he stood up and made a talk in our Sunday-school about China, though he was only eight years old. Our Mission Band gave him a party and also a post card album for his American pictures. We hope he will be a missionary like his father and grandfather, and we are going to send our China money to the Sunday-school at the Stuart Memorial church at Hangchow.

We like our dolls so much that every Sunday some of the primaries get them out and set them around in their little red chairs and tell their teachers who haven't been to the Mission Band all about them. When we see them sitting there, we wish we had the real children they represent here with us, and we find ourselves wanting to save our nickels and dimes to send to these places we are learning about that need so many things. So, you see, our dollars are really doing us good by their "silent influence."

I mustn't forget to tell you that after we have had meetings with all our dolls and learned about their homes we are going to give a doll reception and invite our grown-up friends to meet our doll friends. And we are going to serve ice cream and cake, too.

We are going to introduce the grown people to these doll friends of ours, and maybe they will be so interested in them that they will want to give money to help the real children they represent. So if you don't believe that missionary dolls can make dollars you just get some and see.—A Junior, in Missionary Survey.

For the Southern Churchman. Watch Out!

"Summer is going—if I were a bird
I'd have practised my singing so well and long
That I never would miss a single word"
(The little girl said), "of a single song."
O little maiden, so fond of play,
All through the summer frolicking,
Did you ever practice, a single day,
That place that you learned last spring?

"Autumn is coming" (the small boy said),
"It's time that the squirrels were getting spry;
There are holes to be chosen and beds to be made
And nuts to be gathered by and by."
O little boy, when the cool days come
Don't forget there'll be chores to do,
And lessons to learn, at school, at home—
Don't let the squirrels beat you!

A Happy Visit.

(A True Story.)

Hazel Burgwin Jocelyn, Age 15, Eden, Md.

"Who do you think is coming to see us this summer?" mother asked one morning.

"Who?" I said listlessly, looking up from my book.

"Your Uncle John and little Hazel and Nancy," said mother.

"O, mother," I cried, "do you really mean it—Uncle John and the little cousins I have always wanted to see so much?"

"Yes," mother answered; "they will be here early in June."

I was so happy I could hardly wait, but of course I was not so happy as mother, for she had not seen Uncle John for ten years, and he was her only brother, too. My mother had lived in Virginia all her life until she was married and moved with father to Maryland.

I told all my friends about my little cousins' visit. I planned many amusements for Hazel and Nancy, too, even going to the attic and hunting up old playthings that I had abandoned. Among the toys was a big doll with golden curls and blue eyes that open and shut. Her name was Rosy Bell.

At last the day came for the visitors to arrive. Father went to the station to meet them, while mother and I prepared dinner. I had tried to picture in my mind how the little girls would look. "One will be thin and the other fat," I thought, "one fair and the other dark."

After what seemed a very long time a horse and carriage came slowly around the bend of the road. "They are coming, they are coming!" I cried. "It's father and Uncle John and two of the prettiest little—"

But mother had already rushed out on the porch. There was a happy reunion. Hazel and Nancy were sweet, pretty little girls of about the same size, slim and straight, with short, silky hair, dark and curly, dark brown eyes and lovely complexions. Hazel was six and a half and little Nancy was just five. We all went into the parlor, where our tongues flew till dinner time—what a dinner it was, too!

Hazel sat beside me. "Uncle Mark said," she whispered, "that we wouldn't have much to eat, but we have—lots."

"Uncle Mark was only joking," I said, smiling.

We had lovely times all that summer. Uncle John could not stay the whole time, but he left the little girls with us while he was away. They were devoted to "Uncle Mark," and would follow him all over the farm, especially Nancy, whom he called his "little farmer girl." There was quite a difference in the children in regard to playing. Nancy wanted to be out of doors all the time, playing in the sand, making mud pies or romping with Fanny, our big Shepherd collie, who was devoted to her. Nothing pleased Hazel better than to look at books or draw and paint little pictures. She also liked dolls, and many a tea party did she and Nancy hold on the shady front porch, with Rosy Bell and their two dolls, Elizabeth and Catherine.

It would take a long time to tell all we did that summer. Twice we went to a picnic, and once into the city in a car. The children sang well, and they used to like for me to play on the organ and let them sing. They often amused us with their funny speeches. On the second night of their stay, while Nancy was saying her prayers, she said to her father, "Daddy, hadn't we ought to thank God for all this nice sand to play in?" And we had always considered that sand was a nuisance!

One day I took them to see an old lady called Miss Priscie. They walked boldly up the steps ahead of me. "Good morning, Miss Priscie," said Hazel, and "Good morning, Miss Priscie," said Nancy, as though they were delighted to see her, though they had never heard of her before.

One day I read them a story about a little girl who broke her doll accidentally and buried her under an apple tree. That put an idea into their heads, and they decided to bury Willie, an old doll with a loose head. With mother's scissors they at last managed to get the head off of poor Willie, and the next day there was a funeral under the big oak tree. They placed some weeds on the grave for flowers and stuck sticks in the ground for tombstones. But the next day they dug him up again.

Uncle John was very anxious for us all to move to Virginia, so we decided to do so next fall. I was happier when that decision was made than I ever have been before. To go to Virginia and live among my relations had always been my castle in the air.

Uncle John and the children left in August. "Goodbye, Uncle Mark," they said, as they were leaving. "We've had a perfectly lovely time, and we hate to go."

It was a sad parting, but a happy thought arose among us all—"We shall see each other again this autumn, in old Virginia."

Lucy's Life Preserver.

Mother came to the door with Lucy, to open the umbrella. It was no dainty modern affair, with a silk top and a slender, pretty handle. This was the big family umbrella of stout blue cotton cloth, with a wooden handle, both large and strong.

"Hold it tight, Lucy," cautioned mother, "or the wind will blow it away."

Lucy took hold of the handle almost up in the wire frame work to grasp it the more securely. It needed both her plump little hands to reach around the handle.

The wind tried to snatch the umbrella away from her, but she held it too firmly. Then the wind tried to turn it wrong side out. But the umbrellas of seventy years ago were not to be trifled with, and the wind wrestled with it in vain.

So Lucy and her umbrella went bobbing safely along to school till they came to the brickyard.

The brickyard pit was the most fascinating place, but it was a spot forbidden as too dangerous. To-day the wind would be making fine waves on its water, Lucy knew. Her pace slackened.

"Of course, I wouldn't sail ships on it. I'd only look at the waves and the dimples the raindrops make in the water. Mother would not care if I just did that," argued Lucy to herself.

So Lucy picked her way through the sticky blue clay of the brickyard to the edge of the pit.

The pit was fifteen feet across and eight feet deep—as large as a room and deeper than a man is tall. It was dug to catch and hold the water used in mixing the clay to the right softness for molding into bricks.

To-day the pit was full to the brim and the wind raised quite a sea. It was even more exciting than Lucy had thought it would be.

In her eagerness to watch the waves chase each other across the pit, Lucy leaned forward a little too far. She lost her balance, a gust of wind pushed at the umbrella from behind like a sail, her feet slid on the slippery, wet clay, and the next instant she was struggling in the water.

Instinctively she had clung to her big umbrella, and it buoyed her up so that she did not sink. She shrieked for help, and the brickmakers, burning brick at the kiln, heard her terrified cries, muffled though they were under the umbrella.

They were none too soon.

The waves that had looked so enticing got into Lucy's mouth and blinded her eyes; her clothes were soaked, and their weight was dragging her under in spite of the umbrella.

But the strong arms of the brickmakers reached over the pit and drew out the little girl, choking and very much frightened, but still clutching desperately in both hands the big umbrella that had made such a good life preserver.—Alice M. Farrington, in Sunday-school Times.

You will sometimes hear people say that they don't feel that there is any real need of going to church—that they don't enjoy it, and that they don't see why they ought to do so.

The trouble is that such people are one-sided, and see only from their side

Why I Believe in Nuxated Iron

As a Tonic, Strength and Blood Builder.

—By—

DR. KENNETH K. McALPINE

A Prominent New York Surgeon, Member New York State Medical Society and Former Adjunct Professor, New York Post Graduate Medical School and Hospital.

"The great strain of the present times should make the public generally realize the necessity of fortifying the blood and nerve cells by means of a strengthening, upbuilding tonic. If people would only realize that iron is just as indispensable to the blood as is air to the lungs and be just as particular about keeping up a sufficient supply at all times there would, in my opinion, be far less disease resulting from anaemic, weakened conditions. For years it was a problem with physicians how to administer iron in a form that could be taken up by the system and increase the red blood corpuscles without upsetting the stomach, blackening the teeth or producing other disorders almost as serious as the lack of iron itself. But the introduction of Nuxated Iron has done away with all the objectionable features of the old mineral salts of iron and gives to every careful thinking physician a tried and valuable prescription which he can recommend nearly every day with benefit to his weakened and run-down patients.

"Nuxated Iron, by enriching the blood and creating new blood cells, strengthens the nerves, rebuilds the weakened tissues and helps to instill renewed energy into the whole system whether the patients be young or old. In my opinion, Nuxated Iron is the most valuable tonic, strength and blood-builder any physician can prescribe."

If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of ordinary Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see how much you have gained.

Manufacturers' Note: Nuxated Iron, which is prescribed and recommended by physicians and which is now being used by over three million people annually, is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

of life's picture, so to speak. You know that when you look into a mirror, you don't look quite the same as you do to other people. That is because you see yourself from a different viewpoint. And when people grow away from God, they seem to see only with their own eyes and forget all about how they may look to God.

People shouldn't expect to go to church just because they enjoy it. I dare say very few people always enjoy going to church. I have heard ministers say that it does us the most good to go when we don't feel like it. But anyhow, no one would enjoy going to church so very steadily unless their hearts were truly there as well as their bodies.

You see, we go to church for two reasons: because we want and need to learn God's truths, and because we must worship God. That is the secret of the whole matter—worshipping God. We can't expect that God would send His blessed Son to live and die for mankind and give them a Church just so that people could pass away a certain amount of time pleasantly by attending the services of that Church, can we? God is greater than that; and His plans are greater and deeper and broader and of more account than that.

When people lose sight of the great need of worshipping God truly and with their whole hearts and souls, they grow away from God, and stop understanding Him. Then they are not truly happy, and they don't make other people truly happy. There is something wrong with their lives, but they can't seem to understand just what it is. Their ears won't hear God's Voice; but it is really because they have stopped listening, or have forgotten or never learned how. And that were a pity.

You know there are prayers which praise God, prayers which ask God for things, and prayers which love Him and worship Him and show forth that He is really God and highest above all things. Well, we mustn't be so busy asking Him for things which we think we need and want, that we forget the praise and the worship. God needs the praise and the worship; and if we love Him we will offer Him these first. There is not so much need to ask Him for what we want, for He will probably attend to that almost without our asking, if we love Him. It is love that counts—here on earth as well as in Heaven.

We must not forget that, while God is our Heavenly Father, He is also a King above all kings. And we must pay Him proper homage, which is His due always. We must remember that He is above angels and archangels, and everyone in Heaven or earth. And when we remember that, we surely must feel a great something in our hearts that will make us want to kneel before Him humbly—not just because He is King of all; but because, being King, He still loves us and takes tender care of us.—Shepherd's Arms.

Riddle.

Riddlemaree, dark and strong,
With one bright eye and a loud, loud song;

With a long, long tail and round, round feet,

O but it's noisy, O but it's fleet!
It runs by night and it runs by day,
And as soon as you catch it it darts away;
It runs by land but never on sea—
Who can read my riddlemaree?

Answer to last week's riddle: Morning glories.

"Renunciation is not the keyword of the Christian life. That is the mistake of the ascetic Romanist and the austere and sombre Puritan. Lift your eyes to Him who is not only the Way, but also the Gate. Accept His message of God's redemption. Surrender your will to Him in an impassioned abandonment. You will find the way, though narrow, is broad enough for truth and love, and the gate, though straight, is wide enough for all that makes life sweet. 'My yoke is easy and my burden is light.'"

The wealth of a man is the number of things he loves and blesses; which he is loved and blessed by.

MISS MARIA HANSFORD.

Died at "Clear View" in Stafford County, the home of her nephew, Michael Wallace, on the 29th day of April, 1918, MISS MARIA HANSFORD, in the eighty-third year of her age. Miss Hansford was born at "Greenhigh," in King George County, Va., on January 5, 1836.

She was one of nine sisters, two of whom with her were unmarried and were left with little property after the war. Under these adverse conditions they moved to Washington, D. C., and opened a boarding house, which they operated with such success that in a few years they were enabled to purchase valuable property on North Capital Street, which they sold four years ago to the United States Government, and she and her sisters were enabled to retire to welcomed rest in their old age.

Miss Hansford was a competent and intelligent business woman, she was possessed of a bright, genial and unselfish disposition and was full of charity. She was a member of the Episcopal Church from her early girlhood, and was unfailing in the performance of her duties to it. One of the ambitions of her life was to see Old Lamb's Creek Church in her native county restored, and she worked unceasingly until she had the satisfaction of seeing this accomplished some years before her death.

She is survived by three sisters, Mrs. Helen Dickinson, of Washington, D. C.; Miss Belle Hansford, of Stafford County, Va., and Mrs. George Grymes, of King George County, Va.

In the New Testament Scriptures salvation has three aspects. One of these considers the soul in the moment of acceptance and surrender. Another regards its spiritual course and progress as it follows the upward calling of the Christian life. The third looks away off to the end, when the pilgrimage will be over, and all that time can do has been accomplished.—Selected.

The Soldier's Prayer.

(Written as the trenches were approached.)

O God of Battles, now that time has come

Which in the pregnant months in camp has been

The goal of everything, my hope, my fear,

The peril of the thing as yet unseen.

That fear and wounds and death may pass me by

Is not the boon, O Lord, for which I pray;

For, having raised the chalice to my lips,

I do not ask to put the cup away.

But grant the heart that thou hast given me

May, in the hour of peril, never fail,

And that my will to serve and do my part

May ever o'er my will to live prevail.

Thou knowest, Lord, my soul doth not fear death.

Although my body craves to live its span;

Help me to grapple with my body's fear,

And grant, O Lord, that I may play the man.

Sanctuary.

To keep any one's words in tender memory, and to recall them with confidence and delight, is to find the speaker of them abiding within the sanctuary of our thought and desire. When Christ's words are lodged deeply in our hearts, cherished in hours of meditation, and recalled in times of trial, He abides within us and we bring forth "much fruit." Again, we abide in Him when we abide in His love. To abide in Christ's love is to continue in the sober certainty of its reality, and in the assurance that whatever may befall us, Christ's love will never fail. When we find our lot to be hard, and when we are bewildered by one outlook, or when we have sinned and are tormented by accusing thoughts, to continue to believe that Christ loves us, and longs for us, is to abide in Him.—Selected.

A Prayer in the Night.

Sometimes I wake with dark and quiet round me,
And swift across my vision, like a light,
Flashes the face of one I know who suffers,
Or one whom sorrow newly touched last night.

Perhaps, for just that moment and that purpose,

There lacks a link in God's great chain of prayer;
So, lest the chain be weakened by my silence,
Or break because I fail to do my share,
I shape the link, and know the Spirit's fire
Will forge it into place and weld it there.—Annie Johnson Flint.

He was a very unruly youngster. A writer in the New York Sun says that he had not been in the car five minutes before all the women present and most of the men were explaining to anybody who would listen what they would do with the boy if he belonged to them. There was one woman, a gentle, gray-haired body, who remained unruffled.

"If that child belonged to me," said the woman beside her, "I'd make him mind if I had to half kill him, wouldn't you?"

"I don't know," said the quiet woman. "I don't know what I should do."

"You don't!" exclaimed the positive woman. "Well, I know. But then, maybe you are not used to children? Maybe you never had any of your own?"

"Oh, yes," said the little woman. "I brought up thirteen. That's why I don't know what I should do."

Grow More Grain on Every Acre

Fertilizer Made 10 Acres Yield as Much as 25 Unfertilized Acres

America must grow more wheat. Upon the yields we get from the soil depends the victory we must wrest from the Hun.

How can the farmer, who is short of labor, grow more grain? He cannot do it by increasing his acreage, for that requires more labor! Increased production is best attained when every working hour is employed on fertilized land. Fertilizer increases the grain crop—without the hiring of an extra man—the purchase of extra machinery—or the use of extra power.

At the Ohio Experiment Station, tests were made on growing wheat with fertilizer, and without it. When planted on unfertilized land, it required 25 acres to produce 340 bushels. The total cost (including seed, labor and land rental) was $280, or 82c per bu.

V-C Fertilizers

When planted on fertilized land, it required only 10 acres to produce 340 bu. The total cost (including seed, labor, land rental and fertilizer) was $182, or 53c per bu.

In other words, by using fertilizer, the cost of producing a bushel was lessened 29c—or that much more profit was made. Less than half as much land was needed.

With labor at present wages, the saving is even greater than shown in these tests. Many farmers get an increase of 7 to 8 bushels of wheat per acre from the application of only 200 lbs. of V-C Fertilizers. Use V-C Fertilizers. They contain the plant-foods necessary to make good strong straw and fill out the pods of grain. They insure more bushels in payment for every hour of labor—more profit on every bushel you sell.

Our 50 factories and distributing points enable us to ship with a minimum amount of transportation, but due to the scarcity of materials and freight cars, fertilizers should be ordered immediately. Write for name of V-C Dealers near you

"The American Soldier in France"

A military guide-book for our troops going abroad, by Geo. N. Tricoche, late of the French army.

Read what the chief of staff says about it:

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES

Office of the Chief of Staff

(Extracts from a letter dated General Headquarters, October 15, 1917.)

"... The six copies of 'The American Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing... and the remainder will be distributed to staff officers...."

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover.... Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc."...

(Signed) J. HARBORD, Chief of Staff.

When We Cannot Do Our Best.

People who do only their best seldom do anything. "If I cannot do it in the best way, I am not interested in doing it at all," sounds like a very praise-worthy sentiment; but it is a poor rule, and will not get us anywhere. Some editors were talking over plans they had made for a carefully worked out special number of their journal. Unexpected conditions had arisen since making the plans, and they were confronted with the question whether they should attempt to force through, with considerable risk and uncertainty, every detail of the original plan, or do the best they could with a reasonable adjustment to the new and hampering conditions. The one of longest experience reminded the others that probably no editor ever, under any circumstances, was able to carry out every detail of an issue of his paper just as he had planned it; and that one of the first lessons of an editor was how to make the best out of the next best. The wiser course was followed, and a much better "next best" resulted than had seemed possible when the embarrassing conditions were first faced. God does not want us to yield to whatever ought to be resisted; but God does not want us to resist whatever should be yielded to. Paul was a master-hand at accepting what, to his best human judgment, seemed only next best. And that is why Paul habitually had God's best.—Sunday School Times.

Forget.

It is divine to forgive and forget. All great men forgive those who injure them, and forget the injury. Oftentimes, in our willful obstinacy, we refuse to forgive and forget, and we suffer much loss. Many business men sustain great financial losses through their unwillingness to forgive and forget. If you would increase your happiness and prolong your life, forget your neighbor's faults. Forget the slander you have heard. Forget the temptations. Forget the fault-finding and give a little thought to the cause which provoked it. Forget the peculiarities of your friends, and remember only the good points which made you fond of them. Forget all personal quarrels or histories you may have heard by accident, and which, if repeated, would seem a thousand times worse than they are. Blot out, as far as possible, all the disagreeables of life; they will come, but they will grow larger when you remember them, and the constant thought of the acts of meanness, or, worse still, malice, will only tend to make you more familiar with them. Obliterate everything disagreeable from yesterday; start out with a clean sheet for today, and write upon it, for sweet memory's sake, only those things which are lovely and lovable.—Church Herald.

Jesus' Eyes and Voice.

Those must have been matchless eyes of Jesus, keen, kindly, flashing a blinding lightning, sending out softest subdued light. The Nazareth mob couldn't stand the look of those eyes, nor the bolder Jerusalem mob reaching down for the stones, nor the deputation sent to arrest, nor even the reckless Roman soldiers at the garden gate. The disciples who were closest sometimes followed Him, afraid and amazed because of the look of those eyes. And yet the little children put their arms around His neck and looked up fearlessly and lovingly. And the crowds listened by the hour with their eyes fastened upon His.

The voice of Jesus must have been music itself. It speaks once of His singing a hymn. How we would all have loved to hear Him sing! But that voice was music at all times, whether in song or speech. Low, modulated, rhythmic, gentle, rich, resonant—wondrous music. Those who have heard Spurgeon and Gladstone almost always speak of the rare musical quality in their voices. So and more would it be with this Jesus. It has been said that the personality reveals itself in the speech. It reveals itself yet more, and more subtly, in the sound of the voice. The power or weakness of a man is felt in the sound of his voice. The blind have unusual skill in reading character in the voice. Were we wiser, we could read men's character much more quickly in the voice. Children and animals do. The voice that stilled the waves and spoke forgiveness of sins, that drew the babes, and talked out to thousands at once, must have been full of sweetest music and thrilling with richest power.—S. D. Gordon.

We need one another for our completion. The Christian faith is not the separate relations of millions of isolated individuals with God, nor merely the intellectual acceptance of certain facts and doctrines, but membership in the Church which is the Body of Christ, filled with His Life and so binding the members into One. Each of us has some vision of Him Who is the Truth, but the vision of each is partial, for each is finite. We need to unite in the one Life, to follow the one Way, if we are to comprehend, as fully as finite beings can, the one Truth. And because Christ is the manifestation of God's Love for man, we shall, if we are truly one in Christ, be filled with that Love and so help one another a little nearer to the vision of the King in His beauty.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The fear of death is more to be feared than death itself.

Whatever God will have us do He will help us do.

Whenever you make a mistake make it teach you something.

God never puts His children into the fire without going into the furnace with them.

Patience is not a popular virtue, down here, but it is highly thought of in heaven.

The masses are not reached for the reason that it is so much easier to pray for them than to go to them.

It is more needful to be able to suffer long and be kind than it is to preach with the tongue of an angel.

None can tell the power of good that resides in one sincere and devoted soul. There is a contagion of health as well as of disease, there is an energy of light as well as a power of darkness.

And all through life I see a cross
Where sons of God yield up their breath.
There is no gain except by loss,
There is no life except by death!
—W. C. Smith.

It is a solemn thing to say, "To-morrow" when God says "To-day," for man's to-morrow and God's to-day never meet. The word that comes from the eternal throne is now, and it is a man's own choice that fixes his doom.

Let us, so far as may be, look at life steadily and whole. It is not all darkness; it has its crimson dawns, its rosy sunsets. Its blackest clouds have their silver embroideries, and through the rifts we may catch glimpses of the radiant blue of heaven—Canon Farrar.

Make yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts, bright fancies, satisfied memories, noble histories, faithful sayings, treasure houses of precious and restful thoughts, which care cannot disturb, nor pain make gloomy, nor poverty take away from us—houses built without hands, for our souls to live in.—John Ruskin.

Happiness is not our being's end and aim. The Christian's aim is perfection, not happiness; and every one of the sons of God must have something of that spirit which marked their Master—that holy sadness, that peculiar unrest, that high and lofty melancholy, which belongs to a spirit which strives after heights to which it can never attain.

We men who can sing, may sit comfortably and sing:

"Waft, waft, ye winds, His story;
And you, ye waters, roll;
Till, like a sea of glory,
It spreads from pole to pole."

But that doesn't solve the problem. The only way that the wind and the waters can carry the story the world around is by carrying forward men who go to tell it.—J. C. Buxton.

"One small life in God's great plan!
How futile it seems as the ages roll,
Do what it may or strive how it can,
To alter the sweep of the infinite whole!

A single stitch in an endless web,
A drop in the ocean's flow and ebb.
But the pattern is rent where the stitch is lost,
Or marred where the tangled threads have crossed;
And each life that fails of its true intent
Mars the perfect plan that its Master meant."

"Mention twelve animals of the polar regions," said the professor, and the student wrote, "Six seals and six polar bears."—Youth's Companion.

War Hymn.

Lord, a nation humbly kneeling,
For her Forces cries to Thee,
Strong in faith and hope appealing,
That triumphant they may be.
Waking, sleeping 'neath Thy Keeping,
Lead our arms to victory.

Of our sins we make confession,
Wealth and arrogance and pride—
But our hosts, against oppression,
March with Freedom's flowing tide.
Father, speed them, keep them, lead them—
God of armies be their guide!

Man of sorrows! Thou has sounded
Every depth of human grief.
By Thy wounds, oh! heal our wounded,
Give the suffering ones relief.
Hear us crying for our dying:
Of consolars be Thou Chief.

Take the souls that died for duty
In Thy tender pierced hand,
Crown the faulty lives with beauty
Offered for their Motherland:
All forgiving, with the living
May they in Thy kingdom stand.

And when victory should crown us
May we take it as from Thee:
As Thy nation deign to own us,
Merciful and strong and free:
Endless praising to Thee Raising
Ever Thine our Nation be!—Amen.
—Seattle Churchman.

The first price that a man must pay for leadership is climbing the mountain, the second price he must pay is living in the valley. For though to be a leader of men a man must every now and then climb the mountain that he may catch its clearer vision, yet he cannot be a leader if he stays in the mountain. God Himself did not do that. That is the whole method of the Incarnation. That is where many a man has made his mistake. There are two costs that a man must pay for such leadership in the valley. The first is the risk of one's self; the second is the real passion for humanity. The first of these is incomprehension and unappreciation on the part of his contemporaries. It is just because he has been on the mountain and has seen what lies beyond that those who have not seen will not be able to understand him at times. The true leader is always a little at least ahead of his day. He must be willing to miss the joy of the mere opportunist and time-server. The writer to the Hebrews has put it for all the great leaders of men when he says: "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith received not the promise."—Ex.

There is a man behind you. "Does this open window annoy you?" said a traveler in a car, as he turned and spoke to the stranger back of him. "I don't mind the air, but I object to the smoke," said the latter; "and yet I don't want you to close the window on my account." The questioner shut the window, saying: "You know it isn't the fellow who sits by the open window that gets the draught and the cinders; it's the one back of him. I tell you, a man ought to be careful how he opens a car window. He ought to know how it suits the person behind him before he is willing to ride with his window open." Call that applied Christianity, or call it Christian endeavor, or whatever we may, the spirit of it is what the Christian world needs. Who cares for the man behind him—not only in a car, but in rank, in society, in the Church!—Sunday School Times.

Let God choose for you. Put the choice of everything in life absolutely into His hands, and, when once the surrender has been made, do not look back nor think that He has forgotten, nor suppose that anything outside His arrangements for you would be better. It must grieve Him sorely when the soul which has professed to commit to Him the choices of its life begins either to doubt or murmur. Whatever difficulties may lie around your way, they will be less than those that would have ensued had you taken a way of your own. If another seems to be having the very lot you would have chosen for yourself, while you are left desolate, believe that out of that desolation there is coming presently a wealth of blessing which will fill your life with perpetual song.—F. B. Meyer.

Spiritual service looks not to immediate result so much as to a time of harvest to come. There is a joy set before it, which is a positive inspiration to endure all that is involved of present toil and hardness.—J. S. Holden.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket-manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

The Star of Gold.

Martha S. Gielow.

It was a star all gleaming gold,
Above the plains of Bethlehem
That first proclaimed, that first foretold,
The Christ—the Saviour of the world.

It is a star all gleaming gold,
That heralds heroes who have died
That right may reign, that life may hold,
The love of Him they crucified.

Oh, star of gold, oh, star divine,
Oh, star of glory, manhood, youth,
Fair star of love that lights the shrine
Of God, of country, mother, truth,
Shine on each mother heart to-day
With solace in thy golden gleam,
With peace within the precious ray
Of thine immortal golden beam.

Plain Words About Prayer.

In intercessory prayer we enter most deeply into the spirit and experience of Jesus. His most characteristic prayers were for others—for His friends, for the sick and afflicted, for His disciples, for His enemies. Why should He have prayed for these others; one might ask—if He believed already in His Father's universal loving will? Would not God give to all those gifts which He saw they needed without the intercession of any other on their behalf? That same question men might ask themselves to-day in regard to intercessory prayer.

And the answer is for us, as it was for Jesus: there are certain things which the love of God Himself can only do through the instrumentality of His children, one for another. There are blessings which it requires the human instrument to convey. He cannot give to men the inspiration which can come through the highest friendships until there are friends whose souls are open to become the channels of the highest things. He cannot make righteousness prevail among the nations until there are men in the nations who are willing to be righteous. He cannot make peace until the hearts of the people in this land and every land are ready to conquer by His love the hates and prejudices which make war.

Oh, is it not an awful thing—and yet a thing that may be redeeming, too—to realize that all the agonies of this time may be the punishment we make inevitable for ourselves because we are not ready yet to learn and to live the truths by which they might be ended? We say that we are horrified by the war and its ghastly havoc. We say that we hate the brutal ambitions and the cruel selfishness which caused it. We say that we fight for a world that shall be redeemed into an abiding peace. But what if, while we say these things, the coming of all we profess to desire is blocked by our indifference to the forces through which alone redemption can be wrought?

Admiral Sir David Beatty said of his own country: "England still remains to be taken out of her stupor of self-satisfaction and complacency . . . and until she can be stirred out of this condition, until religious revival takes place at home, just so long will the war continue." And another officer, home from the tragic campaign at Gallipoli, said also of his nation: "I think God is waiting for her to learn many things before the war will end, and she is very, very slow in learning."

How fast can we say that we in America are learning all that God has for us to confess, before the travail of this time may cease? Are we learning yet to hate in ourselves the power of the flesh and the world which make self-indulgence and covetousness so real and the beauty of God so dim? Are we learning to pray, by learning first to want the things we ought to pray for?

Certain it is that the mercies of God can be poured out upon His people only as there arise men and women who cry out to be made the channels through which that mercy may be bestowed. When we intercede, therefore, for one another, for the nation and for the world, we are opening the way for the blessings of God. We are making it possible for the answer to our prayers to begin within ourselves. We are helping to release through us the boundless reservoirs of the waiting love of God.—W. Russell Bowie, in St. Andrew's Cross.

"Can You Drink of the Cup?"

To attain eminence in any worthy enterprise, the main and sane question is not, "Can you get a pull?" but "Have you the push?"

The acquirement of any desired good is preceded and accomplished by the payment of the appropriate price. If it costs little, it is worth little. If it is worth much, it costs much.

Many people are constantly seeking something for nothing, but in the high realms of character and destiny it is the vaguest fancy.

What it does not cost us it has cost some one else. That which is bestowed upon us because it is too great for us to purchase is nevertheless conserved by us, if conserved at all, by obedience, self-obligation, endurance, and suffering. Determination and sacrifice is the rational emblem of all worthy achievement. By this sign we conquer, if we conquer at all.

New elements are not introduced into the universe by the sacrificial plan of human redemption. Everywhere it is evident that eminence and success are not obtained by ease and indolence, not by preference and favoritism, but by intense action and endurance, by going the distance and bearing the load.

If you ask me why these conditions of achievement exist, I must frankly answer, I do not know. If you ask me if it is so, then I must answer, it is not necessary that I explain, for everything that lives makes answer in the affirmative. Endurance is not only a test of strength: it is a means of acquiring strength. It is a law of life. Nowhere is there a known exception.

The tree that grows in the thick forest, protected from storms and dividing the insects that bore into it with a hundred of its neighbors, grows straight and develops rapidly. When it is felled by the woodman's ax its grain is straight, but its fiber is coarse. A wedge will split it from end to end.

It is easily sawed, but it takes no polish. It may do for a telephone pole, for a sleeper for some small bridge over which herds of cattle tramp, or possibly be cut into dimension lumber for the out-of-sight places in a building.

But there is another tree whose beginnings are formed on the lone sands. No forest about it. The winds from all directions bend it. As it waves its roots creep deeper into the soil, until they drink the pure waters below the sand. It is battered by passing herds. The winds break its boughs and nature makes knots in healing the wounds. The wild boar whets his tusks on its sandy and protruding roots. Insects bore into its very heart. It braces against the north wind and is bent in that direction, and bends to the south as it braces against the south winds. In a hundred years it is not a thing of beauty and has attained no mammoth bigness. But when the woodman's ax falls it, no wedge can divide its fine-grained tissue. Only a keen saw can sever it. Its fibers are closely knit, and it will take polish. The knots have formed designs of changeless beauty. The insects that bored into its heart and perished have become nuclei about which fine-spun fibers have curled in clusters of rare and delicate tinted elegance. This tree in power and beauty adorns the drawing-room of palaces and bridal chambers of queens. It paid the price. It drank the cup.

Man—body, mind and spirit—becomes strong and pure by diligent, patient endurance and suffering.

Worthy ideas and laudable ambitions are not attained by wrong methods. Neither are they attained by favoritism, but by ability and willingness to pay the price.

Many ambitious aspirants who would attain eminence "know not what they ask." Many would have the emoluments without the responsibilities, the honors without the sacrifices, the achievements without endurance and sufferings that lie between. Such are irrational, expecting the effect without the cause—the consequence without the antecedents. There is no royal road to eminence.—Frank W. Luce, D. D., in Western Christian Advocate.

The Joy of Service.

God's service is perfect freedom, and to willing and honest hearts it is also perfect pleasure. Work faithfully done for the love of God and of souls can never fail of its reward. It is itself a spring of cheerfulness that never runs dry; a tree of gladness that bears fruit all the year round. We work for the joyful God, and are messengers to men of His overflowing gladness, ordained, anointed and qualified by His Spirit. We work with Him and partake of His nature; and the more we work the larger is our joy; and the greater our joy, the more acceptable the sacrifice of labor we present to Him. "The joy of the Lord is our strength."—J. Clifford.

THE SOUTHERNER'S DUTY TO THE NEGRO.

We have received and read with interest the "Minutes of the University Commission on Southern Race Questions," recently printed in a pamphlet of seventy-five pages. The idea of this Commission was conceived seven years ago or more by Doctor James H. Dillard, President of the Board of the Slater and Jeanes Funds which have been administered with such practical efficiency in aid of negro education. Visiting the State Universities of each of the eleven Southern States from Virginia to Texas, with Tennessee and Arkansas, he found in them all a cordial response to his plan of establishing this University Commission on Race Relations, and the Commission was formed with one representative from each of the Universities. Since that time eight meetings of the Commission have been held at different cities and educational institutions in the South. An Advisory Committee consisting of Chancellor Barrow of the University of Georgia; President Mitchell, of Delaware College; President Alderman, of the University of Virginia, and Dr. Dillard has been appointed. Of the original members of the Commission one has died and one has been elected Governor of his State, but in large part the personnel remains unchanged, showing the continued interest of its members in their work.

The object of the Commission is "to foster a scientific approach to the study of the race question in the South." It seeks to gather and dispense reliable information in regard to existing relations between the races, and especially "to influence Southern College men to approach the subject with intelligent information and with sympathetic interest." It is a programme that must commend itself to every thinking man in the South, for there has been a woeful lack of intelligent and systematic treatment of what we are pleased to call the race problem in the past. When one looks back upon the history of the South since negro emancipation and thinks of the elements present which could so easily have combined to create strife and antagonisms which would have almost destroyed our civilization, one is only amazed that no worse happened to us than came to pass. The explanation lies, not in the way the problem has been handled by the people of the South, and still less by the politicians and better-intentioned but even worse-informed philanthropists of the North, but in that feeling of kindness and mutual dependence which had been so fostered under a former regime as to become almost as ineradicable instinct in both the whites and negroes. It still exists, though sometimes unrecognized and often unacknowledged, in spite of all that ignorance, stupidity and viciousness could do to destroy it. As it has been a safeguard in the past so is it a most hopeful factor in the problems of the present and future. But this feeling cannot be relied upon to solve these problems or even to maintain itself against the impatience and irritations and the lessening degree of services rendered or favors desired which is becoming so marked in the relations of the races to-day. Economic and other conditions affecting both races living side by side with each other cannot be left to haphazard adjustment without seriously endangering the prosperity and happiness of the whole commonwealth; and the obvious duty of the stronger and more advanced race to lend a helping hand to its weaker brother must be fulfilled not only with sympathy but with a broad and intelligent understanding of all the facts and circumstances involved. To jump at conclusions based upon merely local conditions or individual experiences or prejudices will only produce confusion and misdirected thought or effort.

The University Commission has found its subject of investigation to be one of great magnitude. "The problem to be attacked by this Commission," says Professor Sutton, of Texas, "is extraordinarily complex. The problems of all the institutions of civilized life must be considered—of the home, the church, the school, the State, the industrial world and civil society. Our work will involve a patient and careful examination of actual facts. This examination must be made before rational conclusions can be reached. The study of concrete situations is absolutely necessary." Obviously it is no superficial matter to be met by preconceived judgments and horseback prescriptions, but one that is calling for close and careful study.

We would suggest that another field for investigation is the thought and purpose or ambition of the negro himself. Every one who knows the negro at all knows how difficult it is to know him fully. He has a face that the white man seldom sees. His instinct is that, we believe, of all the colored races—to return the answer that he thinks is desired or expected rather than one that is strictly accurate. He has long understood that words are given us to conceal our thoughts, and he uses them freely, as we all do more or less, for that purpose. The negro of to-day in the South is not the same as the negro of a generation ago—we speak, of course, of the average or the composite negro—and who understands the half-intelligent, half-instinctive aims that he has set before him or the methods by which he expects to attain them? Yet at most we can only help him to help himself, and to do that we must know him, not merely imagine that we do, and appreciate the best that is in his purposes and motives, for it is the best and not the worst that we must believe in and discover and encourage if he is to evolve into the useful and desirable citizen that can fill his own place in our land. Education has done something for him and experience more—but what? He has already become a great traveler, and now in large numbers he is in uniform working or fighting in France, and doing it well they tell us. What effect is all this having upon his future? The answer is of vital interest not only to him but to the white South. What kind of leadership is growing up among the colored people in this day of change? May it not be more directly influenced and wisely guided by the whites without undue interference with its initiative or disagreement with its aims? More and more the spirit of co-operation must be cultivated between the races for the lasting good of both. First of all we need to know the subject not only as the negro problem but as the negro's problem and to view it from his angle as well as our own.

One is tempted to quote largely from the addresses and reports contained in the minutes of the University Commission, copies of which may be had by addressing the Secretary of the Commission, Professor W. M. Hunley, Box 722, Lexington, Va., or Miss G. C. Mann, Box 418, Charlottesville, Va. We hope it will be widely read and digested. Meanwhile a few excerpts may give food for reflection.

" . . . The one great task before the people of the South is to develop a more rational viewpoint on all matters pertaining to interracial relations. Our people as a whole feel very much on this subject, but they know very little. Most of the discussion of the problem that we hear is merely an airing of the emotions. But few of our citizens are familiar with the actual civic, economic, educational, hygienic, or religious conditions among the negroes of their own communities, and with so little knowledge at hand they can form no real judgment as to the public policy that intelligent citizens should advocate."—Report on Civic Status of the Negro.

"The elevation of the negro is chiefly a matter of education. To educate the negro and at the same time promote good feeling between the races is a delicate task. Agencies controlled by ideals in accord with the spirit of the South should be provided for training negro ministers, teachers and supervisors of schools. The courses of study in the negro elementary schools should be directly related to the environment of the negro child and, in the main, should be vocational in character."—Professor Doster, of Alabama.

Professor Scroggs, of Louisiana State University, said:

"The four great needs in dealing with our Southern race problems are education, co-operation, publicity and patience. As to education, I believe it is highly desirable that a course of instruction in the race question should be given in every institution for higher education in the South. . . . But even then much more will remain to be done. The real problem, I believe, is not so much to reach the university student as it is to reach the man who lives on Jones'-Creek-at-the-Head-of-the-Hollow. He is not influenced by the printed page, but by the spoken word, and the only spoken word he ever hears on this subject is from one of his own group or from the lips of the demagogue. There is a possible antidote for the demagogue at this point in the rural clergyman. In the rural regions of the South the power of the pastor is still great, but he is prone to emphasize the other-worldliness of Christianity; his theology needs to be socialized. The white churches are doing some work for the improvement of racial relations in the cities, but as four-fifths of our colored people live in the country, the negro really presents a problem for the rural church. Ministers, educators and all other influential citizens need to be brought into co-operation so as to get the best thought of the country on the negro problem before the masses of the people. It is time that sane Southern sentiments should receive as much attention as the blasphemies of the demagogue. We ought, then, to formulate a program of co-operation and publicity.

"And we shall have to practice patience. Whatever progress is achieved will come through a process of evolution. It is just as foolhardy to attempt to force the mental development of a group as it is to attempt to hasten the mental development of a child. No better example of the folly of attempting to force the process of social evolution can be given than that shown in the history of Reconstruction. But we can aid in the process of evolution by helping to increase the negro's wants. As soon as his wants are satisfied he stops work. If his standard of living were higher—and this means simply more wants to be satisfied—he would be a much greater social asset than he is to-day. The negro's legitimate wants cannot be increased in a day; they must develop by a proper kind of training conducted, perhaps, through several generations. This further emphasizes the need of patience."

"The so-called race question, which means the right adjustment of relations between the white man and the colored man in American life, still remains perhaps our most complex and momentous public question. On the whole, no man can deny that this complex problem has been handled for the past thirty years with a great deal of instinctive wisdom by the people of the South, and the result of their constructive thought has been acquiesced in by the people of the North with remarkable and commendable faith and confidence. The problem, however, is not settled, and probably never will be, but may be counted upon to present difficult phases to every generation. Indeed, a certain paralysis of feeling about the whole matter, due to exhaustion, I am inclined to think, seems to have overtaken both sections, and those who are seeking to think quietly about the matter should be grateful for the fact that the negro has somehow gotten off the Southerner's nerves and out of the Northerner's imagination.

"Both sections have turned with unity of effort to bring about a change in the spirit and machinery of our democracy, whereby they believe the interest of all the people can best be advanced. It is wise that, in this breathing spell, patient, wise, scientific, just men should labor at the problem and seek to place it where it belongs among the great economic and sociological questions of the time."—President Alderman, of the University of Virginia.

And note the following fine words from President Wilson:

The members of the Commission were received at the White House by President Wilson. Dr. Brough, as chairman, was spokesman for the Commission. He explained its purpose and described its personnel. In response, President Wilson said:

"I am very glad to express my sincere interest in this work and sympathy with it. I think that men like yourselves can be trusted to see this great question at every angle. There isn't any question, it seems to me, into which more candor needs to be put, or more thorough human good feeling, than this. I know myself, as a Southern man, how sincerely the heart of the South desires the good of the negro and the advancement of his race on all sound and sensible lines, and everything that can be done in that direction is of the highest value. It is a matter of common understanding.

"There is a charming story told about Charles Lamb. The conversation in his little circle turned upon some men who were not present, and Lamb said, 'I hate that fellow.' His friend said, 'Charles, I didn't know you knew him.' Lamb said, 'I don't; I can't hate a fellow I know.'

"I think that is a very profound human fact. You cannot hate a man you know. And our object is to know the needs of the negro and sympathetically help him in every way that is possible for his good and for our good. I can only bid you Godspeed in what is a very necessary and great undertaking."

HERE AND THERE.

The news from England of the rapid spread of the municipal kitchen plan offers the opportunity of reducing the high cost of living in a most effective manner.

We are told that the number of these kitchens, or as we should probably call them, "community cafeterias," has increased from two hundred and fifty in March to nearly a thousand now.

The method by which they are started is for the government to provide twenty-five per cent of the initial cost as a loan, and twenty-five per cent as an outright gift. The other fifty per cent is paid by the municipality in which the kitchen is located.

The average cost of an individual dinner in one of these kitchens is said to be about sixteen cents.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has not always been considered a very practical organization, in fact it has sometimes been accused of fanaticism on the subject of prohibition, but the war has developed its practical side, and we are told that this organization has contributed four ambulances, fifteen field kitchens and two hundred thousand dollars' worth of comfort kits to our soldiers in France. Besides which it has adopted hundreds of French orphans and made other liberal contributions to war relief. It is now planning to take an active part in reconstruction work for wounded soldiers.

President Wilson, in his statement urging the suppression of mob violence, said that every effort should be made "to make an end to this disgraceful evil, which cannot live where the community does not countenance it."

The truth of this last sentence has been recently demonstrated in Nottoway, Va., where a most atrocious crime was committed by a negro, who was very promptly captured, and it looked as though things would take the usual lawless course and a lynching would follow.

However, the words of the President had sunk into the hearts of the leading citizens of the community. The Governor had been wired to send troops to protect the negro, but these men sent a telegram pledging themselves to uphold the law and secure a fair trial. The criminal was duly tried and convicted, and the fair name of Nottoway was not disgraced by mob violence.

The exigencies of war are drawing all sections of our country into a new fellowship. No better proof of this can be found than in the resolution recently adopted by the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense in its session at Atlanta, Ga., commending the splendid work being done by the colored people of the South at this time.

The resolution reads:

"Be it resolved, That the Executive Board, Georgia Division Woman's Committee Council of National Defense, congratulates the colored people of our State upon so excellent a showing of Americanism upon the part of their race; and that this Board offers to any organizations of colored women in Georgia who may express a desire for them to the chairman, such instructions for war work among women as may come to this committee from Washington."

The Salvation Army in Germany, which has been established there for the past fifty years, has been tabooed by the German Junkers and recently had to dissolve. Its orphanages, lodging houses and corps headquarters have been confiscated long ago. It has never been strong in Germany, largely on account of its English origin, but it is only recently that it has been entirely suppressed.

A new mourning, which has been recommended by the President and advocated by the Woman's Committee of the National Council of Defense, consists of a brassard or black band about three inches wide with a gold star, and which is to be worn on the arm, is now being made and distributed by the Red Cross Society. It is the object of the Society to prevent this form of mourning from being commercialized and for that reason the Society is distributing the brassards free, and is desirous that persons using them should make application through its various chapters.

This form of mourning is certainly vastly more in keeping with Christian teachings than the custom of draping the bereaved in unpenetrable crepe, and it is earnestly hoped that the custom will outlast the war.

The Jeanes Fund, for the improvement of negro rural schools, co-operated during the session ending June 30, 1918, with public school superintendents in two hundred and nine counties in fourteen States.

The supervising industrial teachers, paid partly by the counties and partly by the Jeanes Fund, visited regularly in these counties 5,717 country schools, making in all 20,903 visits and raising for purposes of school improvement $204,646. The total amount of salary paid to the supervising teachers was $65,182, of which the county school authorities paid $25,334, and the Fund $39,848.

The business of these traveling teachers, working under the direction of the county superintendent, is to introduce into the small country schools simple home industries; to give talks and lessons on sanitation, personal cleanliness, etc.; to encourage the improvement of school houses and school grounds; and to conduct gardening clubs and other kinds of clubs for the betterment of the school and the neighborhood.

Money is power. It gives you a key to society. It makes you a local magnate. It opens the door of (Congress). He who has money has a consciousness of power. But does it tend to make men altruistic? "How hard for them that have riches to enter into the kingdom of God." That is not a threat. It is a bare statement of a stern moral difficulty—how a man that has riches can keep God in his thoughts; how a man who is conscious of the power which property gives can think of himself, not as a cause and creator, but as a creature and agent of God.—J. H. Jowett.

The Second Coming of Christ. An Essay in Interpretation. By the Rev. S. P. T. Prideaux, B. D., Rector of Dogmersfield, Temporary Chaplain to the Forces.

"... Like snow
They are building still, seeing the city is built
To Music, therefore never built at all,
And therefore built for ever."

New York. E. P. Dutton and Company; 1918. Pp. 173.

The author opens his book by a reference to that "time of spiritual dissatisfaction and discomfort" which comes to the thinking Churchman with the recurrence of the season of Advent, when, in the Advent hymns especially, they "are asked to voice and to assent to the crude literalism and sensuous conceptions which previous ages have handed down. The book is a conscientious and informing study, first of all, of the eschatological teachings of our Lord and the Apostles in the light of the language and current literature and thought of their day. This has been made possible by the great advance in recent years in our knowledge of the religious literature of the Jewish Church during the two or three centuries preceding. As can be seen from the Apocrypha and even the later canonical writings, this was very largely concerned with the "last things," and the language as well as the thought of our Lord's day was moulded by it. His language and that of the New Testament writers was of necessity that of their own time and of those whom they addressed, and unfortunately has come down in popular interpretation in all its literalism. It needs to be refined and spiritualized in the light of their wider ethical, spiritual and mystical teachings as well as in the light of history and the larger views of a more enlightened age. Such a reinterpretation is attempted in a measure, with full references to modern writers in whose works the subject may be more fully studied. The old-fashioned interpreter of God's Word will sometimes utter his caveat at certain overbold deductions or assumptions, as they will seem to him, but will withal find much that is helpful and enlightening.

Christianity and Immortality. By Vernon F. Stoor, M. A., Hon. Canon of Winchester Cathedral, &c., &c. New York and London. Longmans, Green and Company. 1918. Pp. 205. $2.50 net.

A sane and helpful book on a subject which in these days is particularly in men's thoughts. "The modern mind," the author reminds us, "requires above all things reality in its religious beliefs. Essential truth often fails to win its way because it is presented in forms which the advancing thought of the age has outgrown." The study is in those things we are reasonably assured of, with little attention to traditional conceptions or the vagaries of modern speculation. The Scriptures are reverently handled and the recent conclusions of psychologists physicists are seen to be in growing accord with its reserved but sufficient teachings. The chapters on the Resurrection of the Body, the Social Aspect of Immortality, and the Person of Christ and the Resurrection are especially enlightening. It is a book to be read for the strengthening of one's faith and the clarifying of one's views in a region where crudity of thought has often proved the handmaid of unbelief.

These concluding paragraphs are well worth reading, and will give a taste of the style and spirit of the whole work.

"Finally, the reserve of Christianity about the future is magnificently strong. And, as Salmond points out, it has made this contribution of reserve just where it was most needed, 'where the conjectures of men have been least restrained and of smallest profit for the practical conduct of life.' It assures us of immortality, basing the assurance upon the very deepest elements of our being as personal selves, and filling the conception with an inexhaustible wealth of meaning, but it does little or nothing to satisfy curiosity. It provides no map of the other world, and leaves a hundred questions unanswered. It bids us cultivate a reverent agnosticism in regard to these speculative details. Is not such a temper the best soil for the growth of a strong and reasonable faith? Do we not need for our development the discipline which such a reserve imposes upon us? We have enough light to walk by, and the light grows as experience deepens. Christianity tells us this, and it is enough; that we are not mere links in a chain of mechanical happenings, nor mere passing moments in the life of God; but are sons of God, free, spiritual, immortal, with the destiny before us of an unbroken fellowship with Him who made us sharers in His own nature.

"Such a hope is full of power and inspiration for the tasks of life. The individual needs it and society needs it to-day as perhaps never before. How can we face the problems of the future, so complex and so urgent, without the strength which comes from the Christian assurance of immortality? Life is supremely worth living if heaven is the goal. Tasks are worth working at, even though it is not given us here to see their full accomplishment, if there is a hereafter in which both the worker and what is of lasting value in his work are preserved, and where fragmentary efforts fuse into the completeness of a perfected whole. We read that Moses saw from afar the land of promise, but entered it not. Then, so the old legend runs, God buried him in a valley of Moab. God's burials are always resurrections, for the touch of the Divine is ever creative of life. And so the story does not end there; but on another mountain it was given to Moses to see something of the fulfilment of the hopes and labors which had once been his. He understood the significance of life's unaccomplished tasks, and realized the greatness of the scale on which he had worked. So may it be with us; only ours should be a richer experience, since Christ has made sure to us, as was not made sure to Moses, the blessed hope of a life with God hereafter."

GOOD WILL NO SOLUTION.

Mr. Editor: The assumption still widely prevails that when all men are fully inspired with the spirit of good will the Kingdom of God will have come. Thus we are told that we shall have industrial peace when capital and labor approach one another in the spirit of good will. It must be obvious at once, however, that good will alone cannot determine what is equitable and right in the premises—that it would be altogether helpless in the face of an Alphonse-Gaston deadlock; and that, therefore, any settlement upon the basis of good will only must be of the nature of a compromise, a peace without victory for justice, much less for good will itself.

If, therefore, it is the duty of the Church simply to inspire individuals with good will it must be confessed that she has no solution of the social problem to offer. But it is the duty of the Church to preach the Kingdom of God, which consists not merely of members inspired with good will, but also of an outer social order fully adapted to the perfect functioning of that spirit. Therefore, the Church must preach that external social order; and that not for itself alone, but preeminently in the interest of the individual good will. For how can the Church inspire men with good will, how can she train up her children in the way they should go, how can good will thrive and prosper and have its perfect work, in a social order which, by throwing the individual upon his own resources for life, condemns him to a life service of self? Thereby is constituted the throne and rule of Mammon in the world. Even the Christian minister must bow down and worship! For the Pension Fund has only partially relieved him of the necessity of laying up treasure upon earth. Without doubt there lies the main tap root of all the trouble in the fact that the social order in which the individual is compelled to live and move and have his being is so radically and so effectively anti-Christian.

COLORED FIELD SECRETARY.

(Abridged.)

Mr. Editor: There is a matter of vital interest to the well being of colored Churchmen. For many years past the most important request has been made by the Conference of Church Workers, with absolute unanimity, for the appointment of some colored priest as "Field Secretary." All of us could easily understand the long delay in coming to any definite conclusion with respect to the racial Episcopate; but none of us have been able to understand why the Board of Missions have never found it just convenient to grant such request continually made.

There is scarcely a respectable religious denomination or Church having a colored constituency in this country which does not find it both necessary and helpful, to have one or more national officers, field secretaries or agents of the colored race, who regularly visit such congregations, conferences, etc., collect information, impart information and help the people of the constituency visited. What can be the possible objection to a colored priest, of eloquence, information and devotion, laboring among his own race to increase the missionary spirit among them, and revealing to the colored people outside the better and inspiring side of the Church?

THE WAR AS MAKING FOR UNITY.

(Abridged.)

Mr. Editor: Bishop Gailor, in a late letter to Dr. Newman Smyth, has touched the center of the question of united Christian effort when he says that in at least two cantonments there is perfect harmony and cordial understanding. I can speak in some measure of last winter's conditions in France. At a great camp on the coast the same harmonious relations prevailed. There I worked most agreeably with the chaplain, being myself a Y. M. C. A. Secretary. At Camp Zachary Taylor I reported to the chaplains then in training the cordial relationships existent in France between the work of the Y. M. C. A. and that of the chaplains who were there.

Now, as to the main question of better co-ordination and interlinking of the work of chaplains, Protestant and Roman Catholics. Perhaps one of the crucial points involved is in regard to the increased use of the Holy Communion. War certainly makes all men long for religious aid and for God and Jesus Christ. I spoke to twelve hundred appreciative men at _____, and several hundred a number of times at other points. Men came almost in a body to the Holy Communion at _____. This was in a barrack. But the Roman priest at _____ gave up his church to the Y. M. C. A. and army Christmas Eve. I can testify that the spirit of unity, fellowship and co-operation is far greater in France than in the cantonments in the United States. Perhaps on account of the great needs of the men the Y. M. C. A. has three times as much hold and Christian influence in France as at home.

Personally, I am very sorry that the Church of Rome did not work through and with the Y. M. C. A. Her emphasis on the Holy Sacraments and her big-natured sympathy with men in the person of her fine spirited chaplains would have been a distinct contribution to the Y. M. C. A. work in general.

Of course, the Y. M. C. A. cannot Protestantize the Christian world. Nor can the American united Protestantism Protestantize the ancient Catholicism of Russia and the rest of Europe. Dr. Newman Smyth is far too great a seer to believe that we can unify American Christianity and leave out Roman Catholicism in the United States, much less in the world.

The real crux of the question for Protestants is: Are they willing to admit the good Christian character and Christian training of Roman or Greek Catholics? The crux of the question for Roman or Greek Catholics is: Are they willing to acknowledge the fruits of the Spirit in the lives of Protestants? The war is making both these admissions compulsory to soldiers of ordinary common sense and intelligence. Only the religious bigotry of priests or pastors could stand against these acknowledgments. But there would have to be a recognition of the Sacraments of the Roman Communion and the Greek Church by Protestants, as well as this authorization of ministers suggested by Dr. Newman Smyth, before any real progress can be made toward the unity of spirit and the bond of peace.

Meanwhile the Y. M. C. A. as a tube through which the common Protestant Christianity is flowing into the army, and the chaplains as ministers of Jesus Christ to men, not as sectarians, shall continue to break down partisan prejudices and build up strong ties of mutual love and good will. And so perhaps our blessed Saviour shall work toward that unity for which He prayed, and help to bring it about even through this ruthless war which He permitted.

WYTHE LEIGH KINSOLVING.

Chattanooga, Tenn., August 16, 1918.

OBJECTS TO OVERTHROWING THE BARRIERS.

Mr. Editor: I observe that there have been few responses to your request that the Laity should express their views as to what steps the Episcopal Church should take to secure organic unity with other denominations. Perhaps the majority are not willing to go as far as "The Southern Churchman" seems to suggest, yet hesitate to differ with so esteemed an opponent. Believing that I can voice the sentiment of a large host, if not the majority of our Laity, on this subject, I venture to write as you request. Of course, every one must desire Christian unity throughout the world, but I am glad our Bishops are inclined to go very slowly and carefully in giving up too much to attain a possible organic unity with those outside our communion, whereby they will surely antagonize a large body of communicants in our own household of faith. However we may differ with the so-called High Church idealists, it is impossible to deny their earnest devotion to Mother Church in the fullness of her dignity and beauty, and it is certain they will not tolerate any throwing down of the barriers which for centuries have separated the Anglican Church from other denominations. It would seem we should think first of our own Church members and, in considering their viewpoint, remember that "charity begins at home." It is only fair to suppose many members of other denominations are as honestly bent on their own points of difference. To disregard such would be to invite further divisions to the point of chaos. Meantime we can rejoice that baptism is the doorway to the Church, so that all who are baptized in the name of the Trinity are truly members of the Church. Further than this point there has never been a dead, flat unity in the Church of Christ and it is not likely there ever will be till the Lord Himself shall come to make all Christians one in Him. In the earliest days of the Church Councils, St. Paul "withstood" St. Peter "to the face," and later in missionary work his contention with St. Barnabas was "so sharp" that they parted company, and in consequence the Gospel was probably spread farther and faster than if they had remained together. "Man's will is God's servant," and thus the contentions of His people, if honest and earnest, are but as "wind and storm fulfilling His Word." Practically, it may be said, the safety of the world has depended on the divisions of the Protestant churches. By them only have we escaped the auto da fe, the boot, and other tortures of the Holy Inquisition, whereby the rigid organization of the Roman Church overpowered the lesser churches with a terrible unity (although even Rome had the experience of two Popes sitting at the same time, one at Rome and one at Avignon, and the struggles for power by the Dominicans and the Jesuits showed anything but a united Christendom as possible in this phase of the world). Let us never forget the rocks upon which the Church has foundered in the past. Too much organism leads to too much power, wealth and consequent corruption, through men seeking the Church for the loaves and fishes of worldly success. A spiritual unity is all that it is likely we can ever attain, and possibly all we should wish for, since it is better to agree to differ than to pretend to agree. Ordinary social politeness among the denominations, acknowledging the validity of lay baptism, with each frankly maintaining its own organization, but with a united front in all matters of national and local righteousness would seem to a large part, if not most of our Laity, a safe and sufficient degree of Christian unity.

Unity.

Robt. H. Gardiner.

As thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us.—St. John 17:21.

The unity for which our Lord prayed is infinitely beyond human achievement. We can hinder it and seem to mar it, but we cannot create it, for it is perfect oneness in the one Life of the Blessed Trinity.

So long as we consider it a matter for human arrangement, our efforts will be blocked by our arrogance and self-sufficiency, our jealousies and suspicions, our desire for the aggrandizement of self or of our own Communion. It is not a matter of the human will, driven hither and thither by conflicting forces. It is God's will, always one.

Nor is it to be brought about by compromises or concessions reducing the faith in God and the Church, which is the Body of Christ to a statement so colorless that no one will take any interest in it. The faith is the act of the whole of a man, heart and mind and soul and will, by which he surrenders himself to, and so receives, the Life of God through Christ by Whom all things consist.

All life is unity, for life is the mysterious force which binds together the different members and regulates their functions. So in Christian unity the Life of God Incarnate vivifies and binds together and co-ordinates into the infinity of Himself the diversities of mankind.

Our divisions arose, and are being perpetuated, by the pride and diversity and instability of the human will. Finite man has undertaken to delimit the relation of God to the world and, in the pride of his self-opinion, has dared to act as if to him had been entrusted the whole counsel of the Almighty, and as if God were shut in to this or that particular means for the salvation of the world. Hence we have sought our own will, not God's, and our prayers for unity are too often, in substance, only that God will bring the world to agree with us.

Prayer is not to bend God's will to ours, but to bring our wills into harmony with His, and we can pray only that God will manifest to us the unity He wills and give us grace to follow it.

CAMP LIBRARIES.

What would Uncle Toby think of a public library in an army camp? What would he think of a soldier in Flanders who demanded a book on the nutritive value of foods, or the latest work on hydraulic engineering? Would he swear mightily and affirm that the art of war had gone to the dogs?

But the reports from overseas indicate that an educated, book-loving army fights with the best on earth, and that the reconstruction problem is going to be much less difficult because of the presence in camps, cantonments and army transports of the world's greatest literature. It is going to be less difficult for the simple reason that, in countless cases, the American soldiers are reading not to amuse themselves merely or to relieve the monotony of camp life, but to educate themselves for their present work and for better jobs after the war. Examinations of the "best sellers" in the circulating camp libraries established in this country and overseas makes this clear.

It also makes clear the reason why the American Library Association is making a drive for $3,500,000 instead of a contribution of books, as was originally asked for. It is no more possible to build camp libraries with hit-or-miss contributions than it would be to build, in this fashion a university or a city library. The men in the army are simply an average population, indeed a little superior to the average. The men are young, and they have the curious and voracious minds of youth.

Reports from librarians in widely separated camps reveal that soldiers show more interest in non-fiction books than in works of fiction. At the head of the list of books demanded are technical works relating to special branches of army service. In an aviation camp the men are naturally interested in books on flying and flying machines. They want only the latest and best books, just the ones, of course, that never would be contributed. The same is true of engineers, radio students, gunners, signal men, all branches. They know that extra rating and early transfer across depends largely on study and they seize on the technical books which will add to their knowledge. The training camp of a modern army is not merely a place for drill, it is a school. The men study many subjects not included in military technique. The subjects cover practically all which are a part of a grammar or high school course, and even those of the first years of college. The problem of text books alone is greater than the government, the Y. M. C. A., or indeed the Library Association has been able adequately to meet. The extent of the demand may be judged by the recent call from one rather small camp for fifty trigonometries, fifty geometries and seventy algebras.

For use at remote outposts camp librarians make up collections of fifty books to be read and renewed by the men. The collections now contain a certain amount of fiction, for all soldiers read some love stories and some read nothing else. But each unit of fifty contains at least one book of poems, Kipling and Robert Service being especially in demand, history, travel, biography, military science and several recent books on the war. No two collections are exactly alike for the men on outpost duty remain for a month at a time, and books are sometimes their only recreation.

When it comes to men who are working for promotion the camp libraries are hard pressed to furnish enough technical and special subject books. The Association engages to get any book that is asked for, and sometimes to facilitate matters it even borrows. A hospital librarian, writing from San Francisco, tells of a young aviator who was brought in for an operation. His examination for a commission was only three weeks ahead and he was in a dangerous condition of unrest because of the interruption of his studies. The books he wanted were not in the hospital library, but the librarian applied to the city public library and got them. Five days after the young man left the hospital he successfully passed his examination.

Going through long lists of books in circulation in camps in this country and abroad one is struck by the general after-the-war preparation. Very few men intend to make the army or navy their permanent profession, and they use their leisure time and time of convalescence in hospitals to fit themselves for better jobs in peace times. A young lieutenant came to the librarian's desk and asked her to give him some books that would make him a better English scholar. He had not realized until placed in a position of responsibility, how slight his knowledge was. "I'll need a better education after the war," he said, "and I'd better begin work now." The librarian furnished the new student with grammars and rhetorics and he went away happy.

"Have you any books on cost accounting?" the librarian at Camp Custer was asked. "That was my line before coming here. If I go back after we get through this war, I don't want to start in all over again. I must try to keep up with my line while I am working with Uncle Sam."

"They are even studying farming in our army. Almost the next applicant after the cost accountant had been given the books he wanted, demanded something new and good on the subject of hog raising. 'I'm reading up on farming,' he told the librarian. 'No more indoor work for me when I get through this thing. After Camp Custer the outdoor life is the life for me.'"

In the subject index of books purchased for army and navy libraries is listed almost every recent book on business and salesmanship. There are books relating to almost every trade and profession, and the nucleus of an excellent library. Law books, indeed, are in such lively demand that few camp libraries can as yet keep up with it.

RESPONSE OF GENERAL PERSHING TO THE MESSAGE OF THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES.

Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, Commissioner to France, appointed by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, presented to General Pershing a greeting and message of encouragement from the Protestant churches of the United States to the American Expeditionary Forces.

The following response came from General Pershing:

"In the name of the American army in France, as well as in my own name, I thank you for your kind and stimulating message.

"It is the consciousness that the soldier has behind him an undivided nation which enables him, whatever his rank may be, to face his task with courage. We Americans have the added inspiration and encouragement that flows from the example and friendship of our Allies, who, for four years, have been fighting our battles in fighting their own. Standing by their side, we expect not only to vindicate the common cause of justice and honor and righteousness, but also to lay a solid foundation for world peace.

"We dare not claim that, as an army, we have yet achieved that high standard of manhood and conduct upon which the largest human effectiveness should be built; but the ideal of the nation and of the churches is constantly before us. With sincerity and firm purpose we set our faces toward the goal. After all, it is a common fight—yours there and ours here. What is necessary for the manhood of the soldier is necessary for the manhood of the citizen.

"The powerful resources of the nation which have been placed ungrudgingly at the disposition of the army are indispensable for the accomplishment of our duty. But we know that mere wealth of material resources or even of technical skill will not suffice. The invisible and unconquerable force let loose by the prayers and hopes and ideals of Christian America, of which you are representative, is incalculable. It furnishes the soul and motive for the military body and its operations. It steadies us to resist manfully those temptations which assail us in the extraordinary conditions of life in which we find ourselves.

"Your message of loyalty to us draws this reciprocal message of loyalty to you. We of the army think with gratitude and emotion of the unflinching service and wonderful trust in us of the churches at home. May we prove ourselves worthy of it."

A PLEA FOR THE SCHOOLS, FROM PRESIDENT WILSON.

The White House,

Washington, July 31, 1918.

My Dear Mr. Secretary: I am pleased to know that despite the unusual burdens imposed upon our people by the war they have maintained their schools and other agencies of education so nearly at their normal efficiency. That this should be continued throughout the war and that, in so far as the draft law will permit, there should be no falling off in attendance in elementary schools, high schools or colleges is a matter of the very greatest importance, affecting both our strength in war and our national welfare and efficiency when the war is over. So long as the war continues there will be constant need of very large numbers of men and women of the highest and most thorough training for war service in many lines. After the war there will be urgent need not only for trained leadership in all lines of industrial, commercial, social and civic life, but for a very high average of intelligence and preparation on the part of all the people. I would, therefore, urge that the people continue to give generous support to their schools of all grades and that the schools adjust themselves as wisely as possible to the new conditions to the end that no boy or girl shall have less opportunity for education because of the war and that the nation may be strengthened as it can only be through the right education of all its people.

Cordially and sincerely yours,
WOODROW WILSON.
Hon. Franklin K. Lane,
Secretary of the Interior.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in
New Mexico.

XIII. Suggested Remedies.

The need of a better system by which Clergy of the Church are called, settled and supported in their various cures, is very plain. But how can any better system be brought about? To find a proper remedy, the real trouble must be understood. We hear about "dearth of Clergy" yet there are lengthy lists of non-parochial Clergy, some of whom are fit for active service. Frequently, as now, there is danger of a "deficit" in missionary funds. What is the cause of all these things?

The trouble lies deeper than many suppose. Palliative remedies will not suffice to cure the evils. Special appeal may be made for money, to make certain salaries adequate. That does not cure the evil. It is only a temporary relief. The root of these troubles must be reached before any remedies will be permanently effective. And what is this root of present difficulties? The writer would give an answer in these words: An over insistence of the doctrine of religious liberty. In other words, liberty is good, but an abuse of liberty has been harmful. Too much liberty has divided Christians into more than a hundred different bodies.

The spirit of independency is in the land, and it affects our own communion. Parishes act independently of each other. In the smaller towns and in the country it results in long continued vacancies and little growth and prosperity; in large cities, in rivalry and competition and a waste of both money and energy.

What can be done? Can Church legislation help us? Not at present. This American Church is too conservative to make hasty changes. The writer suggests get at the root of the trouble and then apply a remedy. Theoretically we are Episcopal in government. Practically, there is a taint of congregational independency which thwarts the power of Bishops. Religious liberty is good, but when a parish, under the plea of independency in government, calls and dismisses its clergyman as though he were a mere hireling, it is an abuse of the doctrine of religious liberty. When a rector is "called" to a parish, it is for an indefinite time. Theoretically, he may be there for life. Practically, he may be there for a very short time, till somebody is dissatisfied or till he resigns of his own will on very short notice. All this is contrary to Church principles. Many see it and know it.

How many weak parishes are dependent upon some Mission Board for help? In such cases the suggestion is made that such Mission Boards should absolutely refuse to grant any missionary help, unless the power of appointment to the parish is placed wholly in the power of the Mission Board and the Bishop. Again, the appointment should be for a definite time and at a definite minimum salary. There are many places where these remedies would in time effect a radical cure. Even where a parish is self-supporting it will be more just and honorable that there should be an engagement for a definite time with a definite salary.

See how it is in the United States army. Commissioned officers are there for life. Only for very serious causes are they removed. And the enlisted men are there for a definite time and with definite pay. Ought it not to be so with the Clergy of the Church? See again the United States Post Office Department. Presidential appointments of postmasters are usually for a term of four years. Ought it not also to be so in the Church, engagements for a definite time, with a definite salary?

But where is the money to come from? That is an important question. Now, as already stated, there is a divine obligation upon all our people for the support of the Clergy. It comes first before other obligations. Would it not be well if all pledges and offerings for support of Clergy were kept separate from other moneys. For here again there has been abuse. When in any parish only twenty-five per cent of all offerings go for this purpose, and where much more goes for what may be called parish luxuries, when a parish selfishly spends the money on itself, there is an abuse that needs to be corrected. Regular and systematic pledges and offerings for support of Clergy, along with a strict separation of those gifts from all other moneys, might help to correct that abuse. Some voice in the control of funds by the Diocese would probably be wise.

One other suggested remedy. More systematic offerings would increase the needed funds. In this land there are probably fifty thousand communicants, some in vacant parishes and missions, some in isolated places. Many such are making no regular systematic offerings for Church purposes. There ought to be an average of ten dollars a year for each communicant. Many could give much more. Fifty thousand such people might be giving an average of ten dollars a year for support of Clergy. Half a million a year could in this way be added. Regular and systematic offerings from those of our people now doing little or nothing would do this.

But, first, the vacant parishes and mission stations must be filled, and kept filled. Gradually, one step at a time, this can be done. Gradually eliminate the long continued vacancies. Confidence would then be restored. Systematic offerings from places formerly vacant will go far to produce the needed support. To bring about a better system for gathering and using the offering from our people, the co-operation of all Bishops, Clergy and Laity is needed.

Now, Bishops are leaders in the Church. In a war among nations great results are due to the commanders. And just so results are due to the commanders, the Bishops in the Church. They are leaders with a great work laid upon them. And if, with strong will and determination, they impress their God-given devotion on the hearts of others they together, Bishop, Clergy and Laity, by the grace of God make great warriors for Christ and His Church. The Bishop, by his faithfulness and devotion, by his outlook, care and foresight for others in the Church and by his courage and tact in counteracting and opposing evil in its many forms, wins their admiration and devotion, their confidence and their help. Such a Bishop should have a strong army back of him in support. With proper financial support he becomes a great leader with power to do much good.

Great power he should have but not autocratic power. That is harmful both in Church and in nation. His power comes through co-operation with others. There should be great devotion to leaders in the Church, but not the devotion of vassal to a feudal lord.

For these reasons all appointments of Clergy, whether as missionaries or rectors, should be by some constituted authority, a Board of Missions or other organization in which the Laity have a prominent part. There should be no one man rule, but many instead working together.

Our present parish system is very faulty, yet at the same time the co-operation of the Laity is exceedingly useful. Some modification in the powers of a vestry is needed, yet so as to increase rather than decrease the power and usefulness of godly laymen.

In the war among nations our soldiers who have gone overseas are backed in many ways. So, too, the leaders and workers of the Church in the war against sin should be well supported both financially and otherwise.

Most of the remedies suggested in this article could be put into use, without any further Church legislation. When the need is felt some other remedies through legislation may be had, as territorial boundaries of parishes and missionary fields. Some sort of federation of parishes in large cities would lessen waste, competition and rivalry. The Church at large must see the need, and then apply the remedies.

(To Be Continued.)

The Great Commission

LETTER FROM BRAZIL—EVANGELIZING WORK OF ARCHDEACON CABRAL.

Mr. Editor: Due to the increasing interest in the missions of the Episcopal Church in Brazil and to the demand for news about this branch of Christian work, I have determined to write from time to time some notes about the field I visit.

On the 9th of last March I was appointed by Bishop Kinsolving as Missionary Archdeacon, with the duty of visiting and preaching in the various parishes of our Church, besides the pastoral care of the so-called "Missao Serrana," and the rural work at Viamao.

Under the name of "Missao Serrana" (Mission in the Mountains), our Church maintains a work of evangelization up on the eastern part of the plateau that runs from left to right of the State of Rio Grande do Sol. Four places of preaching we have up there, namely, Lageado, Casinhas (residence of our lay reader, Mr. Oliveira Nunes), Boavista and S. Francisco la Paula, this last being the most important, and where the "Chapel of Divine Blessing" (Capella da Bengam Divina) is erected. The generous offerings of native Church people rendered possible the purchase of a spacious wooden building on the main street and the subsequent adaptation of this property to the needs of worship. They are now collecting funds to build a tower where they can place a sonorous bell to call the country people far and near, scattered among the green and undulating fields of the upland, to come and hear the preaching of a message certain not to return empty. The Church work is steadily being pushed on down to the plains. In this part of the country that borders the Atlantic Ocean, the Gospel is now periodically preached in several places, the most important at present being the villages of S. Antonio da Patrulha and Tramandahy. In Tramandahy (a seashore town of 600 fishermen and 1,000 visitors, city people, during the bathing season), the work is only possible during the summer. I spent the entire month of last February there with my family, giving services twice a week with very good attendance, in my ranch, in a hotel hall and in the missionary tent, the gracious gift of the Woman's Auxiliary in the States. The tent was very much appreciated, and we hope to see it rendering still more valuable service during the Bishop's visit next summer to S. Antonio, where we have not yet a place of our own for Church work. The services in this village have been carried on at the "Intendencia" (town hall) with the attendance of the chief authorities and leading persons, many of them having profited by our services at Tramandahy.

Now, two words about my visits to the appointed parishes: S. Gabriel, 3 preachings last April; attendance, 700. Bage, 10 preachings; total attendance, 2,170. Pelotas, 6 preachings; total attendance, 1,565. Rio Grande, 6 preachings; total attendance, 1,500. Total preachings, 25; total attendance, 5,935.

All along the line of preaching stations there were in attendance many persons strangers to our Church and that were for the first time awakened to the call of a Redeemer. There are many heartbroken persons, seeking in vain for light and consolation in a religion of self-salvation through penances, good works, mortifications and masses, with the shadows of purgatory at the end. Many more that are living for the pleasures of the day, not to speak of the large number of those who are deluded by the vagaries of spiritualism. For all these, Christ crucified, newness of life, free salvation, are terms of a new language. Pray for us and for them that we may give them the plain Gospel of free salvation. So shall you be partakers of our joy hereafter.

AMERICO CABRAL.

Porto Alegre, August 2, 1918.

One Day's Income Plan.

On September 13th the One Day's Income Plan crossed the $100,000 mark. Steadily it forges ahead of last year's record, having reached its present total in eight weeks less time than it took in 1917. The number of the Plan's friends increases daily, and a great many of its old friends have increased their offerings materially.

One man, in doubling his gift, said: "The calls are many now, but this one must not be overlooked"—which is but a different way of saying what another meant: "I have enjoyed 'doing my bit' in the Plan each year since it was begun, and it gives me pleasure to be able to double my gift this year. It is to the Church, first, that we must give in this great crisis, for it is to the Head of the Church that we are looking for the strength to come through the struggle victorious." Another says, "I have long realized that men become too old for military service, but never too old to assist in furthering the Master's cause."

A chaplain busily at work among the soldiers sends this observation along with his gift: "As one who has seen the direct application of the missionary funds of the Church, I can't forget that those funds need constant additions in new subscriptions. However, these days, work may be—and, believe me, when I say that it is absorbing in its human interest—it can't put in the background the real work of the Church, missions." From France comes a similar message from a chaplain with the Red Cross.

United Work in South America.

Protestant churches which took prominent part in a Panama Conference two or three years ago are forging ahead in their plans for a great union theological seminary for all of South America. The capital of Uruguay has been selected as the seat, and enrollment of students has already begun. Classes will start in 1920. The languages used will be both Spanish and Portuguese. Dr. W. E. Browning, an American, but engaged in educational work in South America for twenty years, has been elected an educational secretary for Protestant work, and is now on his way to this country, to arrive here at the end of September to confer with the American Missionary Societies. He was lately offered the position of General Director of public education of Bolivia, but declined it. While here he will give a course of lectures at Princeton University.

The South American, Central American, Cuban and Mexican deputations recently visiting the United States, and received at Washington, were worked up in part by these Christian interests, and those identified with the Panama Conference have spent much time of late in assisting in the entertainment and enlightenment of members of these deputations. A dinner was given last week to members of the crews of two Brazilian men of war, the occasion being a return visit for the visit of American men of war to South America two years ago. Progress is rapid toward the colleges that are to be founded by the same Protestant interests at the City of Mexico, at Havana, Panama, Santiago and Buenos Ayres. American missionary leaders say that their somewhat weak efforts, due to war and lack of funds, have been met by South Americans to an extent far beyond their expectations.

On the Church and the War.

In an editorial in the September Spirit of Missions, Bishop Lloyd says:

"There are indeed only two possible laws for man's guidance. One is the law of the jungle, which holds that man must be regarded as a more highly developed beast. The other is the law of life which is revealed by the Incarnate One. This rests in the admission that the law of man's life and the law of God's life are identical. German philosophy has frankly declared that the first is the only practical theory. Germans have undertaken to compel its acceptance by mankind."

"After the war is ended and the race is safe from organized brutality, will it stupidly begin to build again on the old foundations and again erect a temple to sordidness? It will depend on organized Christianity. The Church of the Living God must fulfil its mission if scientific materialism is not again to lure men away from the truth which will make them free."

We must be emptied of self before we can be filled with grace; we must be stripped of our rags before we can be clothed in righteousness; wounded, that we may be healed; killed, that we may be made alive.—Thomas Guthrie.

Church Intelligence

Conference on City Mission Work.

The superintending officers of the City Mission Societies of the Church have been invited to meet in conference in the offices and as the guests of the Philadelphia City Mission in Philadelphia on October 30th and 31st next, for purposes of discussion of problems of City Mission work and the possible organization of a City Mission Council.

The probable lines of discussion will be under the general heads:

Organization for fellowship, co-operation in work, legislation, extension in other cities, promotion of efficiency, inspiration and education of the Church.

Scope and Method: Definition, comparison and suggestion.

Problems: Salaries, Parochial and Diocesan relations, relief, finances, supplies, immigration, penology, institutional work, co-operation with secular and other societies, including conflict, usurpation and surrender, relation of City Mission work with war work, simplified service, literature and propaganda.

It is proposed that this first conference should be without set addresses and of the informal, round-table variety. Invitations have been sent out to all Diocesan officers known to be engaged in City Mission work, but the terminology of the work differs in different cities, and it is certain that some have been overlooked or are unknown to the conveners. If there be such officers or other responsible individuals who desire to be included, they are requested to send their names promptly to Dr. W. H. Jefferys, the Philadelphia City Mission, 225 South Third Street, Philadelphia, who will be glad to forward a fuller statement of the plans and program.

The Rev. A. L. Millet, Philadelphia General Hospital, has been appointed Recording Secretary for the time being. Conveners—Charles P. Tinker, D. D., New York; Ernest J. Denne, Boston; Wm. H. Jefferys, M. D., Philadelphia; H. Cresson McHenry, Philadelphia.

First Meeting of the National Student Council.

The National Student Council assembled on September 10 at Bexley Hall, Gambier, Ohio, to begin its career as the Church's unifying agent in her student work. Ten of the twenty members who at present constitute the Council were present, namely, Revs. F. B. Roseboro, of Yale; Robert Williams, of Princeton; John R. Hart, of Pennsylvania; R. M. Marshall, of North Carolina, and J. M. Page, of Illinois; Professors L. H. Pammel, of Iowa State College, and W. T. Magruder, of Ohio State University; Secretaries Deaconess H. R. Goodwin, of the Board of Missions; W. E. Gardner and Paul Micou, of the General Board of Religious Education; Rev. T. M. Tong, of Wushih, China, was present by invitation to advise with regard to the care of foreign Episcopal students.

The President, Mr. Micou, in his opening charge to the Council, reviewed the history of the student work of our Church up to the conference of college workers at Howe School, Indiana, last May, which created the Council. He then stated the points in the Council's organization and plan which give it promise of being the most important step yet taken in student work. It unifies the student work of the Boards of Missions and Education and the Social Service Commission. It preserves democracy, for the majority of the members are students, professors and college Clergy from the various provinces. It recognizes local autonomy, for it permits the college workers to have any type of Episcopal student organization they think best, provided they carry out a minimum program of work. It sets a goal for student effort in this program, which the Council will interpret from year to year. After outlining the peculiar problems of the coming college session, Mr. Micou stated the matters which required action by the Council.

The Council issued a letter to all Church college workers making suggestions as to the nature of the work which could be done this year with the Students' Army Training Corps. It called upon the women students to share in the Advent Call for intercession during war. It suggested to students in normal colleges the desirability in their taking part in the teacher training work of the Protestant churches this fall. It urged all students to share in the missionary work of the Church by gifts to special objects.

The Council has undertaken to care for the foreign students who are Churchmen. It urges professors who are members of our Church to study church student work this session so as to be able to take a leading part in it when conditions become normal after the war. To aid all college workers to a full understanding of their problem the Council will put forth a manual on methods of Church work among students.

Dr. W. C. Sturgis, of the Board of Missions, was elected Treasurer, and Rev. J. M. Page, Recording Secretary. The conduct of the Council's correspondence was committed to the President. An Executive Committee was created to handle the Council's business between annual sessions. The provincial members, one student, one professor, and one minister in a college town, are to be elected by the Synods. In accordance with this, the Synod of the Fifth Province, also in session at Kenyon College, elected its members, Professor W. T. Magruder and Rev. J. M. Page, empowering the University of Chicago Unit to elect the student member.

Episcopal college organizations which are recognized by the Council are called "Units." Two university societies applied for such recognition, which was granted in both cases. These were St. Mark's Society of the University of Chicago, and St. Francis Society of the University of Wisconsin. In recognition of the fact that the first application came from St. Mark's the Provincial Synod left the election of its student member on the Council to the Society.

Work Among Deaf-Mutes.

During the summer the Rev. H. C. Merrill, missionary to the deaf in the Diocese of Washington, Virginia, Southern Virginia and West Virginia, took advantage of the partial suspension of services in certain cities to visit and hold services in a number of the smaller places and to visit isolated deaf-mutes. While most of the missionary's work is in the larger cities, where the number of the deaf is sufficient to warrant the holding of services with more or less regularity, it is recognized that there are many deaf-mutes scattered throughout his field, on farms and in the smaller communities, one or two, or three or four in each place, who need the Church ministrations just as much as, if not more than, those residing in the larger cities, and efforts are made to reach these people whenever opportunity offers. Instead of taking a vacation, as vacations go, the missionary spent some of the summer in visiting such places, and feels that the results justified the time and effort thus spent.

The missionary acted as chaplain at a convention of the deaf of West Virginia, which was held in Charleston August 30-September 2, giving the invocation at the beginning of each business session, and the benediction at the close of the convention. A special service was held in the Parish House of St. John's Church the evening of September 1, which was attended by nearly all of the delegates in the city at the time.

The following incident of the missionary's work, while perhaps not unusual in the work of a clergyman, may be of interest. In April a deaf man, who who had been baptized some years before but who had delayed being confirmed from time to time, finally came forward and was confirmed. In June the missionary baptized this man's two little sons, although it required some persuasion not to let the matter wait until "next time." In July when the missionary next visited the place, he was met with the information that the man had been killed in an accident soon after his previous visit, thus demonstrating that his own confirmation and the baptism of the little boys had occurred none too soon.

One of the young men presented for confirmation by the missionary last spring, who graduated with honors from Gallaudet College in June, is about to enter the Philadelphia Divinity School and to become a candidate for Holy Orders. He will probably assist the vicar of All Souls' Church for the Deaf, Philadelphia, while studying. There is need of several more missionaries to the deaf to take up new work, to render possible a better distribution of the work now being done and to provide for the continuation of the work when the present missionaries retire.

Another welcome addition to the ranks of the deaf Clergy is the Rev. Mr. Roma Fortune, who was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Cheshire in St. Philip's Church, Durham, N. C., some time in May. Mr. Fortune had been for a number of years rendering efficient and valuable service as lay-reader in Durham. His work will, we understand, be confined to North Carolina.

The Rev. John H. Keiser, curate of St. Ann's Church for the Deaf, New York City, was recently awarded the honorary degree of Master of Arts by Gallaudet College, Washington, D. C. All but one or two of the deaf-mute Clergy are college graduates, holding degrees of various kinds, and the Rev. Mr. Keiser is the eighth of those in active service to obtain the M. A. degree from Gallaudet.

SPECIALIZING COURTS.

Pittsburgh has set the country a fine example in the establishment of a "Morals Court" with Mr. Tensard DeWolf as its first judge.

We are told in the Survey that:

"Under the law this court has only the powers of the ordinary police court, but the ordinance establishing it provides that all cases shall be taken to it which involve offenses by minors, prostitution, illegal liquor selling or domestic relations. In addition, the mayor has asked the new magistrate to handle all cases of gambling. The number of cases that will be annually handled by the court is estimated at about 10,000.

"One of Mr. DeWolf's first acts was to call to his assistance practically every organization working for social betterment in the city. In addition to being dictated by considerations of the service that these agencies could afford, this step was rendered practically necessary by the fact that almost no organization or staff of assistants was provided for the court by the ordinance creating it; one clerk at a salary of $100 a month was all the help given the judge. The agencies called upon have responded willingly.

"Mr. DeWolf simplified his problem at the outset by declaring that in all cases of gambling, illegal liquor selling and operating bawdy houses he would hold for court in every case where the evidence justified it. He opposed the system of fines because he considered that method a mere license to continue illegal practices by paying graft to the city instead of to private individuals. For the ordinary prostitute other than the owner of the house, or so-called landlady, and for the girl on the streets, whether she had been in town for a number of years or was just beginning, he determined to adopt methods of reclamation."

In order to carry on the duties of his court in the most effective manner, Judge DeWolf called in representatives of all the different organizations for public welfare and social betterment.

As a result of this policy we are given the following account of the court in session:

"The picture, then, of the new Morals Court is that of a police magistrate sitting at a long directors' table in a large business office, flanked on each side by a group of social workers. These are re-enforced by secretaries and other officials of the Associated Charities, Juvenile Court, Child Welfare Association, Children's Service Bureau, Council of Christian Churches, and many other organizations. Pittsburgh feels that there is not much room there for corrupting influences!"

The medical profession has been highly specialized for a long time, and has achieved its greatest strides in progress in this way.

It is a wise thing for the judiciary to follow the example of its fellow-learned profession, and to begin to realize that it is an entirely different incentive which induces a man to commit bigamy or embezzlement from that which induces a man to get drunk and shoot up the town.

As the incentive differs so should the penalty, and gradually it is dawning upon those in charge of law enforcement that a punishment should be a cure.

Perhaps the next step will, as it has also been in medicine, one looking to prevention, and we may some day see legal tribunals whose duties will be akin to Boards of Health, to study and root out the causes of crime instead of waiting until the offense has been committed.

Gradually we are catching up with teachings of the Saviour, who recognized the analogy between crime and sickness when He said, "I was sick and in prison and ye visited me."

How many of us appreciate that the only difference between a jail and a hospital is that in the former the patients are weak morally and spiritually, and in the latter they are weak physically?

BROADER EDUCATION.

That the plan of establishing a university in the Holy Land is no mere dream is proved by this news item:

Building on Mount Scopus.

Jerusalem, September 15.—The ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus was witnessed by 6,000 people. The site is on the eastern slope of the mountain, overlooking the valley of the Jordan as it enters the Dead Sea.

Weizmann, head of the British committee in charge of the work, said in his address: "Out of the misery and desolation of war is being created the germ of a new life. This university, although intended primarily for Jews, will give an affectionate welcome also to members of every race and every creed and will be accessible to all classes of the people."

Think of the inspiration of studying upon such a spot and amidst such surroundings.

It is more than likely that one of the features of the new world that is being born to-day through the travail and anguish of the nations will be a broader education, which shall include all sorts of international scholarships after the Rhodes plan, but supported and encouraged by governments instead of individuals.

Already our colleges are being operated by Uncle Sam. What better way to cement and maintain that great brotherhood of mankind which is now being formed in the unselfish comradeship of the camps and battlefields than by a great government system of international education, so that any child, rich or poor, male or female, who begins his or her education, say, in a little country schoolhouse, may end it in such a university as that now being built in sight of earth's most sacred spots.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY AND PLAY.

It is well known to all social workers that the large number of the crimes of children are committed through an exuberance of youthful spirits and lack of a proper outlet, but it is encouraging to see this fact recognized by so high a municipal authority as Mayor Hylan, of New York, who has issued the following proclamation:

To the Parents and Guardians of the Children of the City of New York:

Whereas, the United States being engaged in war, we recognize the necessity of safeguarding our children from the dangers of moral laxity and the increase of juvenile crime, incident to war-time conditions; and,

Whereas, appreciating at all times the obligation of developing our children along lines of healthy, normal physical and moral development, we recognize the present special necessity for great care and attention for their proper guardianship and in directing their leisure time away from the tendencies of juvenile crime.

As Mayor of the City of New York, I, therefore, urge all parents and guardians of children to increase their efforts in providing healthy play activities for their children and to give their hearty co-operation to all agencies working for this cause during the period of the war.

PRACTICAL HOSPITALITY.

A plan has been put in operation in New York which will work equally well and prove just as great a blessing in any part of the country where women are working in the munition plants.

We are told in the Bible that "a Bishop should be given to hospitality," but this quality is not limited to the Episcopal office.

The following communication from the Y. W. C. A. offers a suggestion for hospitality of a most practical and Christian kind:

Is there an unused country house in your neighborhood which factory girls could use for a week-end house party?

Girls working in the gas mask factory at Long Island City have the use of a delightful estate at Ardsley Towers on the Hudson where they can spend their week-ends. Mrs. Samuel Todd Davis, Jr., is lending her home to the Y. W. C. A. Industrial War Service Club for the remainder of the summer.

The need of the gas masks is so urgent that five thousand women employed at this factory have given up their vacations. Instead they take turns going up to Ardsley Towers on Saturday afternoon for week-ends. They are girls from all kinds of families with such previous experience as teachers, musicians, factory workers and society girls.

A blue Triangle secretary acts as week-end hostess and arranges games, music and out-of-door sports on the grounds of the estate. Meals are served on the broad verandas and in the garden. The lowest possible rates are charged.

Seventeenth Sunday After Trinity:

In times like these, in all crises of world and Church history, all thoughtful believers in divine revelation naturally go to the word of God for illumination and guidance; and it is a true instinct that directs us now to two books, one in the Old and the other in the New Testament: Daniel and Revelation. There is a certain analogy between the struggle for faith and morals during the persecutions of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, the troubles of the early Christians in the Roman Empire, and the present epoch. There are, of course, differences in the interpretation of these books, more radical perhaps than of any other books of either Testament. But the foundation of any right understanding of them must be laid—this much must be conceded to the modern historical method of biblical study—in a knowledge of the circumstances under which the books were written, or at least of the original use of them. Now there does not seem to be any room for doubt that the book of Daniel, for example, if not composed during the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, was at least used during those troublous times for the purpose of encouraging God's sorely smitten people. That encouragement was given, first, by the story of how Daniel was preserved under similar persecutions; and, secondly, by a philosophy of history, a plan of God in accordance with which the kingdoms of brute force would at last yield to the triumph of righteousness and the benign but all powerful sway of a Son of man. Now, in order to apply these lessons to our own times, it is not necessary to prove that the "Number of the beast" (Rev. 13:18) means literally any modern individual. Our Lord must be our guide in the interpretation of prophecy's fulfilment; and just as any one who came and worked in the spirit of an Elijah (John the Baptist, for example), was Elijah for all practical purposes (see Mal. 4:5; Luke 1:17 and Matt. 11:14), so any one that behaves like a beast (the kaiser, for example) is a good enough fulfilment alike of Daniel's kingdoms or Revelation's beast. At any rate, one cannot understand the history of God's people during the period leading up to the Advent of our Lord without taking this view of the book of Daniel. For connection with the Eucharistic service, it may be noted that Daniel and the heathen kings are illustrations, respectively, of the spirit of lowliness and of service, on the one hand, and of the pride and arrogance on the other, that are referred to in Epistle and Gospel;

one leading to promotion, the other to degradation.

The evening lessons are keyed specifically to the Collect: the grace of God that is designed to lead to right living, not to the salvation of the sinner in his sins. There is nothing that our popular conception of religion, which makes of faith a substitute for right living instead of a means thereto, needs more than a study of the Sermon on the Mount in connection with what are called "the doctrines of grace." We are by penitence and faith, not by our good deeds, brought into right relations with God (justified). But having been thus through our acceptance of God's free grace brought into this state, we are expected, in the language of the day, to "make good." "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in Heaven."

St. Matthew, the Apostle.

(September 21.)

O Almighty God, who by Thy blessed Son didst call Matthew from the receipt of customs to be an Apostle and Evangelist; Grant us grace to forsake all covetous desires, and inordinate love of riches, and to follow the same Thy Son Jesus Christ, who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. the socialists is becoming a reality; from corporation to national government control of business; railways, mines, and mills all over the country. The business which affects the lives of all the people has been brought under the control of the representatives of all the people. This has been done quietly and effectively because it has been done by the men who own the business. These changes have not been forced by reformers. The business men have done it themselves. They have brought the resources of the business world and put them all in the hands of the government. They had not only the good will but the power; they were not only patriots but business men; they were good-plus. The same devotion of the men of business which is giving to the service of the nation in its stand against the foreign enemy, after the battles of this war have been won, this same devotion must be applied against the everlasting forces in the war whose leader is the devil, whose work is evidenced everywhere; among politicians and in the encouragement of commercialized vice and thus of domestic distress. The same is true of the administration of any business in neglect and defiance of the safety of human element in it. It means that the system under which it exists must be changed. The record books of the judges and physicians are the lists of casualties in this everlasting war of which the devil is the leader, and in which business men are often his helpers, it may be unconsciously. Against all this we need a humanizing of business. It is a great thing to have it nationalized, but a greater thing to have it humanized and Christianized, but not from without, by agitation of social reformers, but from within. The men who at this moment are changing business for the national good must endeavor to change it still further for the social good.—Dean Hodges, to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

When God tells us to give, He does not mean that we shall lose our riches, but that we are to put them in a safer place.—Ex.

Between the Days.

Between the days, the weary days,
He drops the darkness and the dews;
Over tired eyes His hand He lays,
And strength and hope life renews.
Thank God for rest between the days!

Else who could bear the battle stress,
Or who withstand the tempest's shock?
Who tread the dreary wilderness
Among the pitfalls and the rocks,
Came not the night with folded flocks?

The white light scorches and the plain
Stretches before us, parched with heat;
But, by and by the fierce beams wane;
And lo, the nightfall, cool and sweet,
With dews to bathe our aching feet!

For He remembereth our frame;
Even for this I render praise.
O tender Master, slow to blame
The falterer on life's stormy ways,
Abide with us between the days!

For the Southern Churchman. Gardens and Gardeners.

Charlotte Clay shut her front gate with a little more force than was necessary and hurried up the walk. Her mother was sewing on the porch. The girl dropped into the first chair at hand and began to fan her flushed face.

"Mother, the flowers are simply being ruined," she said. "It does seem to me that Roger should do one thing or the other—either take proper care of the garden or else give up the job. I've watched him; he hasn't pulled up a weed for a week. The pinks are nearly choked."

Mrs. Clay assented with a sigh. "He is not at all faithful," she said. "Perhaps I ought to tell your father that he doesn't deserve this month's wages."

Charlotte nodded energetically. "He certainly hasn't earned them," she replied. Her mother waited in silence. She knew that the girl's frown portended something more serious than her small brother's late delinquencies.

"Mother!" Charlotte burst out presently, "what do you think? I ran across Mr. Dudley down town a few minutes ago and stopped to ask him about new lesson series for my Sunday-school class. He was just as cordial and polite as ever, but in some curious way I got the idea that he isn't interested in my class any more. He said he was coming up here after lunch to talk to me. Now, do you suppose this is all my imagination, or—" She broke off with tears in her brown eyes.

Mrs. Clay's gentle face was full of sympathy, but to Charlotte's astonishment it did not show surprise. She threaded another needle before she spoke. "Let's see, dear—you have the B Junior boys, haven't you?"

"Yes, and such a bright, interesting class they make, too. They're mischievous and noisy, but they like me, and I'm sure I make them learn. I took charge of them at the first of the year, and by Easter Mr. Dudley himself acknowledged them the banner class of the school."

Mrs. Clay sewed on in silence. Charlotte looked at her curiously, then her flush deepened. "So," she concluded, a note of sharpness in her tone, "I must say that I have a right to feel hurt. Of course, the little chaps got somewhat demoralized when I left them for my vacation in June, but the first Sunday in July they were all on hand and doing finely. Nevertheless, if the minister wants to take my work away from me—" She rose from her chair with dignity.

Mrs. Clay folded up her sewing. "Charlotte," she said, "just how many Sundays since the first of July have you taught your class?"

Charlotte paused on the door-sill. "Why, I don't mark it off on a calendar," she answered a little stiffly, "but I've been on hand most of the time, I suppose—or else have had a capable substitute." A flicker of doubt crossed her face. "That is, I've asked several girls to take my class," she added, honestly.

Her mother was silent, and she sat down again. "The second Sunday in July," she said, counting on her fingers, "I wasn't there—I'll acknowledge. That's the Sunday I went down to Brockton to hear the vested choir—a mighty good reason for absence, mother, you'll have to admit."

As there was no reply, she went on checking off dates. "Then the third Sunday—let me see, I don't remember. I was in my place, I suppose, of course."

"Wasn't that the day that the Milton girls and their brother came?"

"Oh, to be sure," Charlotte agreed. "Naturally, I couldn't run off and leave my company," she said. "And the girls just wouldn't get dressed till nearly church time." But she looked uncomfortable. "Well, anyway, I was there on the fourth Sunday," she continued, brightening. "I know that positively, because the only way I could make the boys behave that day was to tell them that it was my birthday. Then, the Sunday following, I can't quite remember. I'll get my diary; there everything's down in black and white."

Returning, Charlotte fluttered the closely written leaves with eager fingers. Her eyes searched the pages. "Here it is—first Sunday in August. Oh! that's the time my eyes were weak. I had on dark glasses, you know, and couldn't read a word."

"Couldn't you have talked to the boys, dearie?"

Charlotte waited a minute, then she laughed ruefully. "Oh, mother, I suppose I could. They like talking best. If you persist in making me tell the truth about that Sunday, I was ashamed of myself in green goggles; I didn't go to church, either."

At the record for the second Sunday in August the reader brightened visibly. "Present!" she announced, with triumph. Then her face fell. "But I did turn them over to Patsy Crewe, because the quartette was practising at the chapel, and I just had to hear Phil Barrow's tenor. They were going to sing at Brockton, you know, and Patsy doesn't care for music, and—" her voice trailed off; a vision of lax, inefficient Patsy in charge of ten little giggling boys suddenly materialized before her. She turned rather reluctantly to the next week's entry.

"That day it rained cats and dogs." She looked up with visible relief. "The Junior B boys went to Sunday-school, to be sure, but they looked like wet chickens."

"Charlotte"—Mrs. Clay evidently spoke with an effort—"I hate to ask it, dearie, but what about that Sunday afternoon?"

The brown eyes traveled down a line or two. "Went motoring with Phil and Amy," they read. "It rained pitchforks, but such a lark!"

Charlotte turned the page rather feebly. "The next Sunday most of the boys were out of town. I knew Saturday that they would be, so I didn't bother to go to Sunday-school. Mr. Dudley taught the three that came, he told me afterwards," she ended lamely.

The silence that fell was broken only by turning leaves. "First Sunday in September," Charlotte read, presently, hope in her voice. "It says 'late,'" she reported. "Oh, I remember now. I forgot my roll book and all the papers, and had to turn back almost at the church door. Well, everybody forgets at times, you know." The leaves rustled on.

All at once Charlotte closed the little book with a snap. The face that she lifted was crimson. "Mother! The following Sunday I was late again—I don't even know why; and the entry for the next is simply—'Overslept.' I suppose there isn't anything for me to say." She went into the house slowly.

Late that evening Mr. Clay, returning from his office, crossed the lawn to peer at the flower garden. "See here," he called, "I'm going to dock Roger or know the reason why." He retraced his steps and came up on the porch frowning. "The garden has simply run wild."

Roger's mother interceded gently. "Don't be too hard on him, Frank. He hired little Mose as a substitute on the day of the picnic, but Mose went back on him—and then there have been rainy weeks, and hot days—and Rog is only ten."

Mr. Clay softened visibly, but he did not altogether relent. "Some day he will be twenty," he said, "and weeds and habits grow."

Charlotte met her mother's eyes. "Give him another chance, father," she said. "Mr. Dudley's given me another, and I'm going to take it."

"Helping the parson with his garden?" her father inquired with mild curiosity.

"One of his gardens," Charlotte said, "and I pretty nearly lost my job, too!"

The Beauty of Work.

George had been working hard all the evening over the twentieth chapter of the first book of Caesar. At length he closed the book with a slam. "I think I won't go to college, after all," he said to his family.

"Why not?" asked his father, in surprise, for the great ambition of George's life had always been to go to college.

"Because the entrance examinations are so hard," said George. "I'd have to work and worry all this year to pass my preliminaries and then go at it again harder than ever for the finals. It's no joke!"

"That's true," said his father, gravely, "it isn't a joke. What will you do instead?"

"Oh, go to work somewhere," George answered easily, as visions of money in his pocket on Saturday night and care-free evenings without lessons rose up before him.

"Let's see," replied his father. "That means getting up an hour earlier every day than you get up now. It means starting in as an errand boy on a par with the boy who was blacking boots last week. It means no more afternoons to play in, except, perhaps, on Saturdays in the summer. It means doing exactly as you're told all day long, or else hunting for a new job. It means staying an errand boy, or a porter, or perhaps a clerk at $10 a week, unless you work harder than you ever had to work at school. No one makes any advance in business without hard work."

George sighed dismally. "It's work, work everywhere, and I hate work!" he said.

His father turned upon him sharply. "If you forget everything else I have told you," he said, "at least remember what I tell you now: The man who hates work goes through life with a ball and chain dragging after him. He has a curse upon him that blasts his life. The hobos and the tramps are haters of work. Sneak thieves and thugs and worse are haters of work. So are most of the men at the bottom of the industrial scale. They hated work, and dodged it, and slighted what they had to do, and did just enough to hold their jobs, and they stay at the bottom, hating work still!"

Suddenly his father's tone changed. "When we saw the football game at Cambridge last year," he asked, "do you remember the inscription on the stadium, 'Dedicated to the joy of manly contest'? Learn that 'joy of manly contest' with hard work, my boy!

"Don't run away from work, George! Don't be afraid of it! Meet it bravely, with the joy of manly contest in your heart, and day by day you will begin to find the struggle good, and out of it will come one of the supremely great and enjoyable things of life."

George was quiet for a time. Then his jaw closed with a snap. "I'm going to begin right now," he said, "and I'm going to know what this chapter's about."—Exchange.

FAVORITE HYMNS.

XIV. Nearer My God to Thee.

It is said that this hymn has found a place in all collections of hymns in the English tongue; certainly it is known and loved the great length and breadth of the English-speaking world. Moreover, the words have been translated into many foreign languages. "They have followed into heathen lands," says one writer, "the triumphs of the gospel."

Mrs. Sarah Flower Adams, the author of the hymn, was born early in the nineteenth century, the daughter of Benjamin Flower, an English editor who suffered imprisonment for the freedom with which he wielded his pen. From her earliest youth she wrote verses, and a gifted older sister set them to music. "Nearer My God to Thee" was an intimate poem of personal experience, we are told, a memorial to an answered prayer, and this fact lends it an added sweet significance.

The setting of the hymn, Jacob's great dream at Bethel, is a vivid and beautiful one, and the application of the Bible narrative to the Christian life is strikingly made. Doubtless the beautiful symbolism of the second stanza has comforted many a dark pilgrim since Jacob's:

Though like a wanderer,
My rest a stone,
Yet in my dreams I'd be
Nearer my God to Thee!

After her beloved sister's health began to fail, Mrs. Adams nursed her to the end with devoted care. The shock of her sorrow seemed only to purify and refine her already strong faith. During the few short years that remained to her she lived and practiced the profession of her two powerful lines:

Out of my stony griefs
Altars I'll raise.

The hymn was first published in England, in 1841, and became popular in this country about fifteen years later. In 1872 it was sung at the Boston Peace Jubilee by nearly fifty thousand voices. "Nearer My God to Thee," says one commentator, "expresses a willingness to know God through the discipline of affliction; to descend into valleys in the ascent of that spiritual mountain whose summit is everlasting light."

Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee,
E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me;
Still all my song shall be
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.

Though like a wanderer,
Weary and lone,
Darkness comes over me,
My rest a stone;
Yet in my dreams I'd be
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.

There let my way appear
Steps unto Heaven;
All that Thou sendest me
In mercy given;
Angels to beckon me
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.

Then, with my waking thoughts
Bright with Thy praise,
Out of my stony griefs
Altars I'll raise;
So by my woes to be
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.

Or if on joyful wing
Cleaving the sky,
Sun, moon and stars forgot,
Upward I fly,
Still all my song shall be
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.

A Useful Branch of the Service.

While thousands of Americans are fighting for freedom on the other side of the sea, thousands more who must stay at home have not been idle. The report of the National War Garden Commission is in, and it makes good reading. During 1918 five million, two hundred and eighty-five thousand garden plots were planted, with an estimated crop value of five hundred and twenty-five million dollars. The increase of fifty-one per cent over the record for 1917 is due to three things—first, the experience gained from last year's work; second, the intensive campaign of this year, and, third, the fine co-operation between employer and employee.

The aftermath of the gardening season is no less encouraging. The canning and drying "drive" is now at its height, and women all over this broad land are vying with each other in the conservation of the splendid stuff that the gardens have yielded. Spice is added to the campaign by community fairs and exhibits, and the offer of National Capital Prize Certificates and Thrift Stamp awards.

The Ladies' Home Journal devotes an entire page to sketches of women who have won prizes offered by the War Garden Commission. Since the achievements there shown are fair samples of what is going on along that line all over America, we may well feel that the man behind the gun has an able ally in the woman in front of the stove.

One woman conserved over a thousand and quarts of fruits and vegetables, having obtained most of the vegetables from her seventy-five-foot war garden. Another Western woman raised enough vegetables at home to supply a family of five all summer and had enough left to put up large quantities for winter use. A Missouri worker from a garden measuring sixty-five by eighty feet, canned three hundred and twenty-seven quart jars of fruit and vegetables and stored away thirty pounds of navy beans, six bushels of potatoes and a large supply of other vegetables. By way of good measure, she raised a pig, fed partly from waste products. A Colorado housewife, after raising and canning nine hundred quarts of fruits and vegetables, sold a hundred and twenty-five dollars' worth. She also raised, the same season, chickens and Belgian hares and preserved fifty-six dozen eggs for winter use. All this was accomplished on a small summer home, a ranch of an acre and a half. When she was ready to return to town and found that she could dispose of her chickens, live-weight, for only sixteen cents a pound, she set to work and canned them—they brought in cans a dollar and twenty-five cents a quart!

God Bless Our Men.

Dedicated to the Women of America by Rev. Edwin Hinks, Grace Church
Elkridge, Maryland.

I.
To Thee, O God, we pray
For those now far away
 Battling for right,
Whether on land or sea,
Grant them the victory,
Making the nations free
 By Thy great might!

II.
God bless our men so brave
Crossing the ocean's wave,
 God bless our men!
May they protected be
Winning a victory,
Making the nations free.
 God bless our men!

III.
O Father, guide our men,
Bring them safe home again
 Over the sea.
Save them victorious,
Steadfast and valorous,
Thou reigning over us,
 All praise to Thee.

"I wish I had your creed, then I would live your life," said a seeker after truth to Pascal, the great French thinker. "Live my life, and you will soon have my creed," was the swift reply. The solution of all difficulties of faith lies in Pascal's answer, which is, after all, but a variant of Christ's greater saying, "He that willeth to do the will of God shall know the teaching." Is not the whole reason why, for so many of us, the religion of Christ which we profess has so little in it to content us, simply this, that we have never heartily and honestly tried to practice it.—W. J. Dawson.

Recipe For a Happy Day.

A heart full of thankfulness,
A thimbleful of care,
A soul of simple hopefulness,
An early morning prayer;
A smile to greet the morning with,
A kind word as a key
To open the doors and greet the day,
Whate'er it brings to thee;
A patient trust in Providence
To sweeten all the way—
All these combined with thoughtfulness,
Will make a happy day.

For the Southern Churchman. Autumn Time.

The children had been holding a little sale on Louise Gray's lawn, and by the time everything was over the air had grown so chill that they were almost shivering. The boys shrugged their shoulders under their coats, and the little visiting girls had to send home for sweaters. When they gathered on the porch to count their earnings, one or two were inclined to be cross.

"I'm so sorry summer is over," sighed Louise, as she brought out chairs for her guests. "All the good times will soon be ended, now."

Several little girls copied her frown, and one or two of the boys nodded. But Louise's Aunt Jean, who was helping them count the money, looked up in surprise. "Why should the good times be ended?" she asked.

"Oh, well," Louise answered, rather ashamed, "the bathing and the picnics have to stop; and little sales and lawn parties like this one—"

"And the roses all go," put in May Burton, a little girl in a scarlet sweater. May loved flowers and bright colors; she looked very doleful now, though she had been laughing just before Louise spoke.

"And our fingers are too numb for baseball," Harry Fenton said.

"Fish don't bite, either," Donald Greene, his chum, added.

Tiny Julie Moore looked ready to cry. It never had entered her head before that one time of the year was less happy than another; but all of a sudden September seemed rather sad. She could not think of any particular reason why, so she pined: "And the pretty trees are not green any more."

Everyone tried not to smile at this, and Bob Miller struck in with his reason. "I hate most to lose the peaches and berries—and oh, my, the watermelons!"

Everybody began to look a little sober. They didn't even brighten up when Aunt Jean announced that the sale had brought in three dollars, clear. "Well, that's finished now," she said. "Let's take a walk before the sun goes down."

Everybody liked to go out walking with Aunt Jean, so presently they were strolling out toward the country, red sweater, blue sweater and all.

A little way outside of the village Aunt Jean pointed to a large oak tree. "See, a few of the leaves have already faded," she said.

"Oh, Aunt Jean, they haven't faded!" Louise cried. "They're a beautiful yellow, and in a few weeks the whole tree will be just like gold. The gum beside it will be red as fire, and the maple beautiful."

"So they will," agreed Aunt Jean, "and then Julie will play that the leaves are ladies in party dresses."

Julie looked interested. "And they'll drink out of acorn cups and saucers," she said happily.

"What kind of tree is that over in the middle of the field?" asked Aunt Jean, pausing a little further on.

"Why, Aunt Jean!" the whole crowd exclaimed together. "That's a chestnut—didn't you know it? That's where we go nutting, every year, in October. And, oh, the fun!"

"And these are chinquapin bushes," one of them added. "Gathering chinquapins is fun, too."

"We have persimmon trees in our south field," small Teddy Wray boasted, with pride.

Aunt Jean smiled at Bob. "Well, Bob, you won't have to starve when summer's gone," she said.

Bob colored. "No," he agreed. "I s'pose not. And then there are autumn apples—the best kind of all. But nothing takes the place of watermelons."

The little company moved slowly on down the road. "Pumpkins make up for them a little," Don suggested presently. "You can't have pies from watermelon, and you can from pumpkins. And a candle in a pumpkin head is great fun, I tell you!"

May gave a little cry of pleasure, all at once. "Oh, look at that spray of goldenrod," she said. "Miss Jean, isn't it the loveliest thing you ever saw?"

"Those purple asters are almost as pretty," said Louise.

"And that pearly life-everlasting," May added.

"They help a little when the roses are gone, don't they?" Aunt Jean asked, slyly.

It was May's turn to color now. "They certainly do," she acknowledged. The children all looked at one another. They began to understand.

"Still, the baseball and the fishing will be over when the warm weather goes," Don said. "And there's no more Fourth of July for a year."

Harry broke in eagerly. "No, but sure enough there's Hallowe'en and nutting—"

"And Thanksgiving and snowballing a little later on," Bob said.

"Yes, and there's popping corn around the fireplace at night, and lessons. School is lots of fun, you know," Louise looked quite happy again.

"And pretty silver frost," Julie piped again.

"Which is frozen dew, little Julie," Aunt Jean explained. "So you won't lose your dewdrops, after all."

It was nearly dark when the walkers reached home, their cheeks glowing and their eyes bright. A rosy fire had been lighted in the parlor of Louise's home, and shadows were leaping on the wall.

"Good night!" called the other children from the gate. "Good night, Miss Jean. We don't feel a bit cold any more."

Bob Miller lifted his voice above the others. "And we think fall's a pretty good old time, after all!" he said.

"I guess I had just forgotten," laughed Louise.

Bed-Making.

There is a post-graduate class in the forest schools. Not all the young wood folk enter this class, but a goodly number of graduates, both feathered and furred, take the course in bed-making. To learn to make your bed does not sound as if it would be hard, does it? For some of the woodland youngsters it is the most difficult of all their lessons.

Take the Downy family, for instance. Father Downy always wears a bright red cap, pushed far back on his head, and all his sons imitate him in this respect.

"Chuck, chuck," he calls on a bright autumn morning, "come and make your beds for winter." No young woodpecker dares disobey that peremptory "chuck," and they all hasten after their father as he leads them into the deep woods. "What's this hole?" asks a young Downy, poking his beak inquiringly into the small round opening in a birch stump.

"That," his father answered, "is the doorway of blackcaps' nest, where a family of chickadees lived last spring. You make your bed in there if you like, my son. Enlarge the doorway, clean out the inside, and chip out the bottom to make it deeper. Then you can carry in a wisp or two of hay, if you wish. All the other children will have to chip their beds from dead limbs. Ready-made beds are rare in these woods."

"How I wish we were robins or bluebirds!" cried one Downy daughter. "They don't have to make any winter beds. All they do is to fly away to the South, where the sun is always shining."

"Fie!" cried Father Redcap. "If all the feathered citizens went south in winter, who would take care of the trees? Who would search out the destructive grubs and the millions of insect eggs hidden away under the bark? I want you all to be first-class tree wardens before spring arrives."

"You're so stout, mother," cried a young woodchuck to her parents, "you can hardly get through the door."

"I shall be trim enough when spring comes," said her mother. "Waddle down this tunnel I've dug and see my snug bedroom at the end of it, with a nice couch of soft hay to sleep away the winter on."

"I'm going to start to-day," cried daughter Chuck after she had inspected her mother's snuggery, "and make myself one just like it."

The white-footed mouse family and the gray squirrel tribe each make one great bed into which they all snuggle, with their aunts, uncles and cousins.—Margaret W. Leighton, in Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Taking Home Eliza.

Larry and Max were a proud pair when their father said they might have the job of taking home Eliza, Uncle Alec's red heifer, which had strayed to their farm in the night. As he wanted to send along a sample of his good apples and turnips, he told the boys that they might as well go in the buggy. They could put the baskets in front, he said, and lead Eliza by a long rope.

The boys decided to take turns at driving and leading. As they moved slowly down the road behind old Ben, with Larry driving and Max holding the rope and Eliza following, they wished that they might meet some one whom they knew. The wish came true, for at the first turn in the road they met Clem Talley.

"Hello!" cried Max. "Want to get in?"

Clem looked surprised to see them driving alone, but all he said was that he had a new puzzle to show them and did not mind if he did get in. Clem was a fat boy, and to make room for him Larry and Max had to get out and move the two baskets to the back of the buggy. The space behind was small, but by raising the lid and putting up the buggy top they were able to wedge the baskets in. Then they themselves climbed in again and were soon busy with the puzzle.

It was such a wonderful puzzle that Larry and Max almost forgot to take turns at driving, and they quite forgot to keep an eye on Eliza, as their father had charged them to do. Once Max remembered to look out of the little window at the back.

"Eliza's all right," he said. "I can see her tail switching at the flies."

Old Ben turned in at Uncle Alec's farm before any of them knew they were there. Uncle Alec himself came out to open the gate.

"Well, well!" he cried. "I didn't know you two fellows could manage Ben alone!"

"That's not all," said Max, with pride. "Look what's behind the buggy."

Uncle Alec looked. "Why, if it isn't Eliza!" he said, in a pleased tone.

"There's something else back there for you, too," Larry added, as he started to let down Ben's checkrein.

Uncle Alec was untying the heifer. "What else?" he asked. "I don't see anything but Eliza."

The boys laughed; even Clem had to smile. "How about all that stuff in the baskets?" Larry said. But Uncle Alec declared that he did not see any "stuff."

Max and Larry hurried round to the back of the buggy, still laughing. But their laughter stopped when they looked into the baskets. Both were empty. Not a turnip or an apple was to be seen.

"Why, they couldn't have jostled out!" Larry gasped.

"And nobody took them," said Max. "We didn't meet a soul anywhere on the road."

"Did you keep a good watch behind you?" their uncle asked.

The boys did not understand. "Nobody crept up behind," Max insisted, "because we'd have seen him while we were watching Eliza." They all three seemed bewildered.

Uncle Alec was looking hard at the heifer. "So you watched Eliza, did you?" he asked.

Larry and Max grew slowly red in the face.

"I forgot to," Larry said, in a low voice.

"I saw her tail—once," faltered Max, redder than ever.

"How about her head?" asked Uncle Alec; "her mouth, for example?"

He turned away and began to pull burs out of the heifer's red side. All at once the boys understood.

Max spoke first. "But, Uncle Alec, could a little cow like that eat all those apples and turnips?"

"Pshaw! That was just a lunch for this cow," was Uncle Alec's reply. "But never mind; maybe she needed it after going without her breakfast." He felt sorry for the boys, they looked so downcast.

"We'll have to tell father," Larry said bravely, and Max nodded. "He'll never let us drive again."

"Yes, he will," said Uncle Alec;

"after I tell him you've been punished enough. But don't forget: next time you lead Eliza watch every inch of her. You hear?"—The Youth's Companion.

Friendly Helpers.

In the country where Jesus lived there, was a man who had been sick for a long time. He could not walk, or even move his hands. He was paralyzed. This is a rather long word for the name of a disease, isn't it? You know that all over your body is a network of tiny cords, called nerves, that are constantly sending messages to your brain. They tell you when you are hungry, when you are cold; and the moment you cut your finger the news goes at once to your brain, so even if you could not see you would know what had happened.

When one is paralyzed these little messengers do not act as they should, and the poor paralytic will often say, "There is no feeling in my hand."

All the paralytic in the lesson could do was to lie on his bed, day after day, watching what went on in his little home and listening to the footsteps and voices outside. He had four friends who sometimes came to see him and told him what was going on in the city. Sometimes they lifted him on his bed and carried him out into the sunshine and fresh air.

One day they saw some sick people come to Jesus and go away healed. No doubt they said to each other, "If He were but to touch our friend he would be well, also." Very likely they hurried away to tell the good news to the poor sufferer. When they reached his house they knew just what they were going to do. They tied strong cords to the corners of the bed, which was really like a heavy rug, and carried him out into the street and up to the doorway of the house where Jesus was.

Then they found that there were so many people that they could not get anywhere near to Jesus. It must have seemed as though their plan was a failure and that their poor friend would have to go back to his dark little house without being cured.

But the men said, "We will not give up. We will find a way yet." So they took him up the outside stairway to the roof of the house. It was not very hard to loosen the material of which the roof was made. Then they were able to lower their friend until he lay right at the feet of the Lord Jesus.

Jesus was so touched with their faith that He said to the sick man, "Arise and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house." It was a wonderful message and the poor man must have been almost too happy for words when he found that he could walk home instead of being carried. Don't you think the four friends were happy, too?—Shepherd's Arms.

What Mamie Did.

Mamie and Ruth were playing with their dolls, and talking busily.

"Rosa's sweater doesn't look very nice," Mamie apologized as she buttoned the collar around Rosa's bisque neck. "Just look at that hole. She's so hard on her clothes, but she's going to have a new one for her birthday, aren't you, Rosa, dear?" (Mamie's dolls were always very real to her.) "I've been saving up my money for the wool for ever so long. I'll have enough when mamma gives me my allowance to-morrow."

"Who's going to make it?" asked Ruth.

"I am. I can knit some now," Mamie answered proudly, "and I'm going to ask my grandmother to show me more when she comes next week. The sweater's going to be blue—light blue. It will be so pretty with Rosa's black hair, won't it?"

"Yes, but it will soil awfully quick," said practical Ruth.

After Ruth had gone Mamie went into the house to find mamma. She was talking with Mrs. Hall, and they were so absorbed in their conversation that they never noticed Mamie when she slipped into her own special corner of the alcove, and, taking a favorite book from the shelf, began to read. But her attention soon wandered, as scraps of the conversation floated in to her. They were talking about the war; Mamie knew there was nothing private about that, and besides, she took for granted that they knew she was there, and soon she forgot everything except the thrilling account of what the soldiers were going through.

"There'll be a great deal of suffering this winter, they're poorly prepared for cold weather—many of them. I wish sometimes I had a dozen hands so I could do more," Mrs. Hall said, knitting away still faster.

"Well, I think you do an amazing amount with your two. Mine seem so worthless now," and Mrs. Lane laughed a little sadly. "I feel like a drone, but you know how interested I am in the work, don't you?"

"Why, Eleanor Lane, of course I do, and I know, too, all the sickness and all the other things you've been through. And how generous you've been with your money—don't be so foolish!"

And after a while they talked more about the Red Cross work, and what the different ones were doing. But Mamie was too heartsick to hear any more, and she hurried up to her own little room.

"There isn't anything I can do—not a thing," she said to herself dejectedly. "If I was grown up I'd go to the Red Cross and I'd make sweaters, and I'd roll bandages and do lots of things, or I'd be a nurse. But there isn't anything I can do now!" and the gray eyes grew misty. Suddenly a thought flashed into her mind. "Oh, I wonder if I couldn't get some wool for a pair of wristlets instead of getting Rosa a sweater. I don't believe they'd be hard to knit." Then, as she heard the hall door close, she hurried down to see if mamma was alone. Mrs. Hall was gone and Mamie was soon telling her mother excitedly what she had in mind.

"And mamma, I don't think it would take any more wool than the sweater would—you know she's a big doll."

"You dear child!" and mamma hugged her close. "You've been planning for the sweater so long I'm afraid it will be pretty hard to give it up. But the soldiers do need the wristlets!"

"O mamma, I want to do it, I couldn't have a bit of fun making Rosa a sweater when I knew how the soldiers needed things. When grandmother comes I know she'll teach me all about them."

"Well, darling, you won't have to wait for that. Mrs. Hall said the Red Cross is going to have a class to teach little girls, and it will begin next Monday after school."—Harriet Winton Davis, in Zion's Herald.

Answer to last week's puzzle: A railroad train.

The Difference in Religion.

"As for me, I think one religion is about as good as another. It's mostly a matter of climate and race and tradition."

"That's so," said the other man. "Christianity is sentimentally attractive. But what has it ever really done? It has broken down under the war. It's no better than any other religion."

The world is small, and travelers in America may expect the unusual. The two men were on a transcontinental train. A man seated across the aisle who had the air of a foreigner suddenly leaned forward and said very politely:

"Pardon. But your remarks, which I could not help but hearing, deeply interest me. May I say why?"

"Surely. Go ahead," the first speaker replied, looking curiously at the foreigner.

"Thank you, sir. I am an Armenian. I was born in Bitlis. Bitlis has about forty thousand people. Have you a town of that size you can think of in America?"

"Just the size of my own town," said the second man.

"Take your town, then, and call it Bitlis; and say of your town these things: No hospital, no doctor, no dentist, no church, except the mission and the Armenian, no press, no telephone, no sanitation, no water system, no library, no transportation, no public school. And that is your town here in America. That is, you understand, my town of Bitlis in Turkey."

"The one bright spot in my town is the Christian mission, which supports a dispensary and a school and the hope of life. During the recent uprising against the Armenians, in which over three hundred thousand of them were massacred, the missionaries in Bitlis, aided by those in Van, at the risk of their lives, saved me from torture and death. All my relatives were murdered and our property was utterly destroyed. My wife and children were tortured and burned alive in my house."

"Do you wonder that I cannot agree with you that one religion is as good as another? Gentlemen, it is Christianity that has stretched out its healing hand to the tortured people of Europe, and after the war it will be the spirit of the Master that will build up life on the ghastly ruins. I am a witness of it."

The men who had flippantly dismissed Christianity in two sentences spent the next hour learning some wholesome truths about Christian missions and heroes of the cross. The Armenian was helping the Bitlis missionaries raise money for a hospital in his city. The two travelers pulled out their pocketbooks to make a contribution.

"Send it to the headquarters in Boston," said the defender of Christianity. And they did, to the agreeable surprise of the treasurer.—Youth's Companion.

and His ordinances, or to the assemblies of His people for prayer and praise. He must not stop short even at His holy table, or rest satisfied with privately opening his heart to His ordained ministers. He that is content with only drinking these waters shall "thirst again." He must go higher, further, much further than this. He must have personal dealings with Christ Himself: all else in religion is worthless without Him. The King's palace, the attendant servants, the richly furnished banquetting house, the very banquet itself, all are nothing unless we speak with the King. His hand alone can take the burden off our backs and make us feel free. The hand of man may take the stone from the grave and show the dead, but none but Jesus can say to the dead: "Come forth and live." We must deal directly with Christ.—Bishop J. C. Ryle.

"To help make strong, keen, red-blooded Americans there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. Nuxated Iron often increases the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, run-down people in two weeks' time. It is now being used by over three million people annually, including such men as Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, formerly Secretary of the Treasury and ex-Governor of Iowa; former United States Senator and Presidential nominee, Chas. A. Towne; General John L. Clem (Retired), the drummer boy of Shiloh, who was sergeant in the U. S. Army when only 12 years of age; also United States Judge G. W. Atkinson of the Court of Claims of Washington and others. Nuxated Iron is dispensed by all good druggists everywhere.

Cralle: Died at his home in Boulder, Mont., September 2, 1918, RICHARD MORRIS CRALLE, son of the late Richard K. and Bettie Morris Cralle, of Virginia.

Mr. Cralle, though a native of Virginia, has spent the best part of his life in Montana, having gone as one of the pioneer civil engineers with the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Smith: Entered into rest, on Sunday, July 28, 1918, MARY MARSHALL SMITH, wife of the late Dr. David B. Smith, and daughter of the late J. Thomas and Margaret Lewis (Marshall) Smith, of Fauquier County, Va.

A life of brief happiness followed by increasing loss and pain, but marked throughout by patient faith and unselfish love, is ended to earthly things, and a long-expectant heart rejoices in the presence of her Saviour and the rapture of reunion with kindred spirits on the further shore.

NANCY HUGHES DAVIS

Entered into eternal rest at her home in Fountain Inn, S. C., September 6, 1918. The interment took place in the City Cemetery, Laurens, S. C., the Rev. Wilmot Holmes, her devoted rector, conducting the service.

The death of this consecrated Christian brings sorrow to many homes. She was truly a friend-maker with the personal charm to retain friends. The influence of so rich and gracious a life is not extinguished by its earthly end, for very gentle thoughts come to many to whom her life will be a help and inspiration. She was a helpless invalid for over two years, but not once did she complain of her lot, always bright and cheerful, accepting it all with Christian fortitude. Now, even through tears for our loss, we, who loved her devotedly, can give thanks that she has been released from her suffering and entered into the rest that remaineth for God's saints. She was before her marriage Miss Nancy Beverley Hughes, of Virginia. Besides her husband, Robert W. Davis, she leaves her father, Captain E. T. Hughes; three sisters, Miss Brooke Hughes, Mrs. W. R. Cocke and Mrs. R. S. O'Mohundro, of Virginia, and a brother, Dr. Rolfe E. Hughes, of South Carolina.

The failure of the Southern Churchman to fill orders for "The Church in the Furnace" is explained in the following letter:

The Southern Churchman Co.,
Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen:

"The Church and the Furnace" is published by our London house and shipments from abroad are very irregular and uncertain at the present time. This book has received a good deal of favorable publicity, which makes all the more embarrassing our inability to keep a stock on hand. Our order is in and your copies will be sent as soon as we get a supply through the custom house.

BEFORE YOU GO TO FRANCE LEARN
FRENCH AND ABOUT FRANCE

"The American Soldier in France"

A military guide-book for our troops going abroad, by Geo. N. Tricoche, late of the French army.

Read what the chief of staff says about it:

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY
FORCES

Office of the Chief of Staff

(Extracts from a letter dated General Headquarters, October 15, 1917.)

"... The six copies of 'The American Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing... and the remainder will be distributed to staff officers."

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover... Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc."

(Signed) J. HARBORD, Chief of Staff.

Rev. Dr. W. P. DuBose, we stated that his health had failed after his retirement in 1908. We learn that his health was generally good during this period and that his last illness was but of short duration.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Richard Wilkinson has arrived in Montgomery, Alabama, and expects to take charge of his new work as rector of St. John's Church on September 29.

The Rev. Dr. Wyatt Brown, after a vacation spent on Georgian Bay, Canada, has returned, much refreshed, to his parish, the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, Pa. To this parish Miss Christiana Kerfoot, daughter of the first Bishop of the Diocese, recently bequeathed the sum of $3,000.

The Rev. W. F. Colclough, for the past nine years pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Hammondport, N. Y., has become a postulant under Bishop Talbot, and is serving St. David's Church, Bangor, Me.

The Rev. Francis B. Barnett, rector of Christ Church, Ridley Park, Pa., has resigned to accept a captain's commission in the chemical warfare service. After two weeks at Camp Humphreys he will go to Lakewood, N. J., for intensive training as a gas officer. Mr. Barnett has just returned from France, where he served a year as a Red Cross chaplain.

The Rev. W. B. Roberts, for the past ten years missionary in charge of that part of South Dakota known as the Rosebud country, has received his commission as chaplain and reports at Camp Dodge on September 20.

The Rev. S. A. Caine will serve as locum tenens at Grace Church, Mt. Airy, Philadelphia, during the rector's absence in France.

NOTE Result of 15 years tests, Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station.

It requires twelve hours of human labor to grow an acre of wheat. What do those twelve hours of labor yield? Note the result of conclusive tests at the Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station.

One way—without fertilizer—yielded 11 bu. per acre—or a little less than a bushel as reward for each hour's work.

The other way—with fertilizer—yielded 24 bu. per acre—or 2 bushels of wheat as reward for each hour's work.

In other words, these experiments proved that every hour spent in growing wheat on fertilized land brought in twice as much grain as the same amount of time spent in growing it on land without fertilizer.

The fertilizer actually added 13 bushels more to the acre yield, paying for itself over and over again. These are experiment station facts. In view of these facts can you afford to plant wheat without applying fertilizer?

Fertilizers

Give the crop the food it needs to build good strong straw and plump the pods of grain. Nitrogen is needed, in addition to Phosphoric Acid. For to beat the Hessian Fly, wheat should be planted late. The Nitrogen enables it to get a good start, even in cold ground, and resist the ravages of the fly.

Order Fertilizers Early

Our fifty factories and distributing points enables us to get fertilizer to you with a minimum amount of hauling, but due to the freight congestion, you should order NOW. Write us today for the name of V-C Dealers near you.

Ordinations.

In Christ Church, Puyallup, Washington, August 24, Bishop Keator ordained to the diaconate Mr. Edward Munson Traber, who has been serving as lay reader for some time at Christ Church. The candidate was presented by the Rev. F. T. Webb, D. D., and the sermon was preached by the Bishop. The Rt. Rev. L. H. Wells, D. D., and the Rev. Charles Y. Grimes were present and assisted in the service. Mr. Traber will remain in charge of the mission at Puyallup.

TRY THIS FOR YOUR HEALTH.

For diseases which do not readily yield to drug treatment, such as chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, rheumatism, Bright's disease, gall stones, uric acid poisoning, and diseases of the kidney and liver, the best physicians send their wealthy patients to the famous mineral springs. Some even spent months at the Spas of Europe and were almost invariably cured or greatly benefited.

I believe that the Shivar Spring is the greatest mineral spring ever discovered and I believe it so firmly that I offer to send you enough water for a three weeks' treatment (two five-gallon demijohns) on my guarantee that if it fails to benefit your case I will refund the price. You would hardly believe me if I told you that only about two out of a hundred, on the average, say that they have received no benefit. The water is restoring thousands. It restored my health when my friends and physicians thought my case was incurable and I am willing and anxious for you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocket-book. If I win you become a life-friend of the Spring. If I lose I will be sorry for you, but I will appreciate your courtesy in giving the water a trial and will gladly refund your money on request. Sign the following letter:

Deposition.Diocese of Pittsburgh.

Notice is hereby given that on Wednesday, September 11, 1918, at the Chapel of the Church Rooms, Pittsburgh, and in the presence of the Rev. L. F. Cole, the Rev. T. J. Bigham and the Rev. C. J. De Caux, I pronounced sentence of deposition upon the Rev. John Lyons, priest, of the Diocese of Pittsburgh (in accordance with Canon 33 of the General Convention), he having abandoned the Communion of this Church, and having made in writing, under date of May 3, 1918, formal renunciation of the ministry of the same.

CORTLANDT WHITEHEAD,

Bishop of Pittsburgh.

Sept. 14, 1918.

If Christ's servant is to stick to his task, he must believe not only that what he does is worth while, but that what he does is for ever. He must write into his creed what some Christians have called "the final perseverance of the saints," and others, "the final preservation of the saints," and still others, "the final perseverance of God's grace," but which, translated into the language of Christian experience, means that God does not do imperfect work in the soul's salvation.—J. I. Vance.

The Christian sees blessing in what men call troubles; he sees gain in what men call loss; he sees glory in what men call death.—J. D. Jones.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

It takes a great deal of goodness to keep beauty beautiful.

Don't lose any sleep worrying about God's part of your work.

When sin runs to hide it forgets that it cannot cover up its tracks.

They are never alone who are accompanied by noble thoughts.

While we are true to God darkness is always the forerunner of light.

There is no way of getting children to be good like showing them how.

It is not what we give to the Lord, but what we keep from Him that makes us poor.

The devil hates the preacher. But he is often very well satisfied with the collection.

If a man expects and believes great things of himself it makes no odds where you put him.

An active faith can give thanks for a promise, though it be not yet performed, knowing that God's bonds are as good as real money.

If thou wilt not withstand,
Christ's resurrection thine may be;
Do not, by hanging down, break from the Hand
Which, as it riseth, raiseth thee.

—Herbert.

I will hazard the assertion that no man ever did, or ever will, become truly eloquent without being a constant reader of the Bible and an admirer of the beauty and sublimity of its language.—Ames.

There is a most wholesome medication in a round of daily tasks. The man who has enough of reasonable productive and congenial work to fill the bulk of his waking time and is not cheerful therewith, must have a very bad conscience indeed.

What, indeed, does not the word "cheerfulness" imply? It means a contented spirit; it means a pure heart; it means a kind, loving disposition; it means humility and clarity; it means a generous appreciation of others' and a modest opinion of self.

Prayer is the reaching out of the soul to God, not in asking, merely, but in sharing all life's experiences, joyous or sad, with the Heavenly Father. Prayer can be both regular and spontaneous. If we pray only at stated times, prayer becomes a formal rite. If we pray only as we feel the need, we are not likely to form the habit of constant dependence on God. Daniel's custom is a good one; but it would be possible to kneel in prayer three times a day and yet miss the divine help when we needed it most. The prayers that mean most in our lives spring from the heart without forethought or preparation, in crises where almighty power seems our only hope.

Picturesque Definitions.

A certain Siamese teacher is remembered by a former missionary chiefly because of his unique definitions of English words. Some of these are the following:

Kick—A verb of the foot.

Hop—A verb of the frog.

Liar—A bad adjective for boy.

Flattery—A good kind of curse word.

Wig—Hypocrite hair.

Bullet—Son of a gun.

Whiskey—Sin water.

Women's Part in the War.

Women, since their emancipation by Jesus Christ, have been great helpers of God in their willingness to suffer and make sacrifices for His cause. He is greatly relying on them now and they are not failing Him. They and their sons are the only ones making any real sacrifices in this crisis. They are grandly giving their sons, their very heart's blood, for the cause of human liberty over all the earth, without which life would not be worth living.

The men are voting billions in bonds for prosecuting the war, which posterity must pay. But it is not a gift. It is a loan with good interest and the best security. The real giving, as working in the Red Cross day in and out, and week after week, and giving their boys besides, is being done by the women, and God seems to be preparing to reward them by giving them a share in the responsibility of governing the country. May they prove worthy of the trust reposed in them, which they are soon to exercise. It is only the slackers, the Judases who are asking: "Why this waste of life and money?" The only answer is that if it will bring in the righteous, peaceful and permanent reign of the Son of God, the Prince of Peace, it will all be well spent, nothing will be lost, and Jesus will commend it, as He did Mary, if the women offer Him their sons and their services, as some slight expression of their gratitude for what He has done for them. If they accept their new responsibilities in this spirit we will soon see the dawning of better days than the people of the earth have ever known before.

But there is one thing that the women should not forget, and that is that their very highest and most sacred duty to God and country is to raise men and women who shall in the future be fit to bring in "the coming age of brotherly men," and to carry it on 'till it has resulted in all men, everywhere, of every race, coming to know God as the Father of all men, and to recognize all men as brothers.—Bishop Johnston, in Church News.

The Call to Action.

The test of life is action. The reason why some fail where and when others succeed is because some go forward to new and untried experiments in the art of living, while others—those who do not succeed—stay inside their customary limits. They could do more if they would risk more. One man plunges into the stream and swims across to the opportunity that brings him fame and fortune, while another stands shivering on the brink. If the man of one talent in the parable had only known it, his opportunity was great. Money breeds money, and when he had made two talents out of his original one it might have been just as easy to make his two talents four; but what he did was to wrap it up in a napkin and keep it clean and uncontaminated by the gross handling of the money-lenders. The successor of the man in the parable may be seen any day, correct, respectable and inefficient! In these prophetic days there have been some startling revelations. Men and women who have never done anything, and didn't suppose they could do anything that was not habitual and commonplace, have been startled into activity and surprised into successful enterprise. "When all the world was in motion they were compelled to move, and when their one talent was demanded they threw it into the common treasury, and lo! it became two.—The Christian Register.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

During

the past 30 days this Company has qualified on 12 estates, either as executor, trustee or administrator, involving over $700,000.00.

This is an evidence, we think, of the fact often commented upon here, to-wit:

Prudent men and women understand the safety and economy of selecting the VIRGINIA TRUST to handle their estates.

"The White Company."

By Mrs. M. W. Proctor.

(To those whose little sons have gone Before.)

We, whose dear sons just tried life's little day,

Nor stayed to see its morning well begun,

We cannot send a gallant soldier son
His valiant part against the foe to play.
Did the Great God of Battles choose afar
Such souls to be His legions in this war?

We, who are childless in this mortal scene,

Have nought to offer of our very own;
Nor cherished nestling, now to manhood grown;

We only dream what glory might have been.

Let us not grieve, for, haply, such are sent

A sinless, pitying, heavenly armament.

They, spotless, knowing naught of earthly woe;

Wondrous and strong and full of heavenly love;

May they not come with succor from above,

To save their mortal brothers here below
In that "White Company," by angels led,
Seeing whose shining ranks, the foe has fled?

St. Zebedee.

One day, our Lord as He came to the lake saw three men fishing, James, the son of Zebedee, and John, his brother, and their father. He called to them. The younger men went with him; Zebedee stayed behind. You can see him looking down the road along which his sons are going to the fair and larger life. Just as to-day men are going out to the big tasks, as they go to war, some must stay at home because somebody must attend to the fishing; somebody must attend to the business in order that James and John can go care-free and apply all their energy to spiritual enterprises; thus shall James and John be supported. The work of Zebedee is left out of account in our usual recounting of the work of the Christian saints. There is no halo about his head; he is not generally regarded as a saint. James and John go to the front, but it is such workers as Zebedee who must do their work at home in order that James and John may leave. He is the most encouraging of saints; his work is always an inspiration. In this war we who are kept at home with the necessary duties may band ourselves together and call ourselves in the medieval fashion: "The little brothers of St. Zebedee"—wherever we are and whatever we do. It is for us to increase in strength of piety, sanctity of spirit; to enrich the quality of our life. For their sakes, for the advancement of the great cause, for Christ, for the Kingdom of God, we sanctify ourselves, to improve ourselves, desiring to be good; but desiring to add to our goodness all the success of the influential graces and masteries of which we are capable.—Dean Hodges.

It is the demands, not the promises, which make men of us; the responsibilities, not the enjoyments, that raise us to the stature of men and women.—P. T. Forsythe.

Battle Hymn.

Rev. M. S. Barnwell.

Lord God of Hosts, we come to Thee
With breaking hearts and bended knee;
With spirits bowed in guilt and shame,
We breathe this prayer in Jesus' name:
"Lord God, look down upon our men
And bring them home to us again."

Thou, Lord, hast taught us in Thy Word
For right and truth to draw the sword,
That better far than peace with sin
Is battle joined that right may win.
Obedient, God, we gave our men;
O bring them home to us again.

Above the far-flung battle line
Let light, O God, and glory shine
Into their hearts and make them brave.
Thou only, God, art strong to save—
"Look down upon our splendid men
And bring them home to us again."

The proud have risen in their might
And challenged truth and mocked at right,
And made Thine earth to reek with blood,
And set at naught man's brotherhood.
Against them, God, now hurl our men,
And break them into dust again.

In this their day of greatest need
Send, God, their Captain-Christ to lead
Them on to victory o'er the foe
And walk with them where'er they go
Till truth and peace and justice reign,
Then give them back to us again!
Amen.

Must Coin New Word.

They were Americans. Perhaps it was their birthright. More likely it was a new thing; newly born of the day and the business of the day. Whatever it was, whenever and however it came, it was present.

"How are you making it, sport? . . .
Here's a cup of coffee."
"You come around to me after you've given some to the boys over there. They need it."
That is what was there. It has read something new into the meaning of the words American soldier. As the doctor said, some new word must be coined to designate it. It was born of battle and agony.

A hurry call was sent to the Y.
"Can't you do something for these boys that are being brought in here?" the officer in charge demanded.

"What can we do?"

"Something to eat and coffee. Do you know some of those boys have been out there in that fighting for two days with nothing to eat but hardtack!"

So the Y sent its men and its trucks;
it made coffee, it brought such fruit as it could; it carried chocolate bars.

"Here you are, sport," said one of them, coming into the courtyard.
"Here's a cup of chocolate."

The boy raised himself painfully on his elbow and reached for the cup—then he motioned it away.

"I hain't hurt much—and there's a lot of guys here that's messed bad. You hain't got enough to go around. Git busy."

"I've got plenty for every man. Go ahead."

"Honest? I won't be robbin' none of them birds?"

"Honest."

The boy drank—and was transformed. He lay back with his eyes closed, and the expression on his dirty face was such a reward as few men ever earn.

"That's livin'," he said softly.

They were coming back on stretchers wounded, gassed, shell-shocked, to an advanced dressing station. Some of them seemed just boys.

"Hard luck, Pal?" said a doctor interrogatively, as the bearers set down a stretcher in the courtyard.

The boy shrugged his shoulders and grinned wanly.

"Comin' fine if I can get you fellers to save that foot. She's smashed plenty. If you can't—all the same."

"We'll run you right in."

"Nix, bo, not me. I'm gettin' past all right, nothin' but my foot. You jest lemme be here and git busy with them guys that's hurt. I'm on the waitin' list."

He belonged to an outfit that bears a name far and wide for being boiled hard. But now they had felt the scorching breath of war. Suddenly they had been dropped into the furnace and had come out with dross burned away. Something had happened. They were still hard-boiled. Their language was made up of the same words, but the words had taken on a new meaning, their very faces had taken on a new aspect. In spite of blood and grime and the discoloration and burn of gas, you could see that something was present there which had been absent before—until you could not see at all for the flooding of your eyes.

"I got mine . . . No use—sport—
Can't do—nothin' for—me . . . Git —busy with some of them boys—you kin—help."

That was the spirit. They had forgotten themselves.

A boy was brought in with a broken leg. It had been an accident and not a wound won in battle. He had gotten in the way of a motor truck.

"Jest fix me up out here what you can," he said.

"You get to the hospital, son."

"Nix. Hospital's for those fellows that's hurt. I just got a busted pin.
You fix me here and leave me here.
. . . When you git a chance."

Somewhere, some time, they had all gotten this thing. Out of the battle and the suffering, something better than they had ever known came to them.

There was utter ignoring of self, and it was a thing wonderful to witness.

"We've got to have a new word in the language," said a captain-surgeon.
"Game won't do. These boys are something more than game. I've never seen anything like it. I don't know what it is." Even he, inured to suffering and to scenes of bloodshed, wiped his eyes.
"They're—they're—why—they're something! Nobody was ever like them."

Of all the sins in which men engage, the one absolutely without excuse is profanity. Every man who swears declares himself, so far as the matter at hand is concerned, to be without self-control, without argument, without character. Apart from all consideration of its sinfulness in the sight of God and its offense against the law of the land, it is the most abjectly puerile thing that an able-bodied man ever does.—C. L. Goodell.

THE COMING WAR-WORK CAMPAIGN.

The week of November 11-18 has been fixed upon by those in authority for the "drive" for necessary funds for the Y. M. C. A. and allied organizations officially recognized as agencies working for the moral and religious welfare of our army and navy.

It will then have been just a year since the last campaign for funds for the Army Y. M. C. A. How long a time it seems, and how much we have learned since then about the magnitude of the task our country had undertaken and the cost of carrying it through, and how splendidly the people have risen to every call made upon them because they have been thoroughly united in a common purpose! The Y. M. C. A. at that time asked for thirty-five millions for the work committed to them by the government for one year. This sum, and considerably more, was given them freely and gladly. The work that has been accomplished with these funds by the War Council of the Association is known in part to every one who is even remotely informed as to the conditions surrounding our men in arms; in part it will only be known when "the day shall declare it," for it is written in the souls of these men.

It was soon found that there was room and need for other agencies to engage in work of the same general character. Voluntary organizations sprang up eager to help; many of which have done excellent work. Some have been found superfluous, others appeal to local or special interests; a few have been found so necessary and of such general availability that they have received governmental recognition. Of these are the Young Women's Christian Association, the American Library Association and the War Camp Community Service. The work assigned to these is well known. Other associations, doing practically the same work as the Y. M. C. A. in ministering to the welfare and morale of the army, but for reasons more or less obvious not affiliating with it, are the National Catholic War Council, working through the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Welfare Board, and the Salvation Army.

For these also the government has found room, in order that the whole nation may serve this great cause without friction and without reserve.

Obviously each of these agencies needs money for its special work, and a great deal of it; such great sums, indeed, that no ordinary system of contributions can be relied upon to supply them. Recourse must be had to organized campaigns for raising enormous funds, and these must be undertaken at times when no conflicting "drive" is on to engage the attention or divert the contributions of the whole nation, and they must be pushed with concerted energy and after long preparation involving considerable cost and the activities of a host of men and women.

It was plainly unwise and almost impracticable that a separate campaign should be conducted on equal terms for each of these objects demanding public support. Recognizing this, the authorities of the Y. M. C. A. agreed to include in their financial campaign the sums needed for the Y. W. C. A., the Camp Community Service and the Association for furnishing Camp Libraries. The Government had necessarily to be consulted in regard to these plans since its co-operation was essential, and the request came from the President, equivalent in this case to a governmental direction, that the allied interests of the Roman Catholic and Jewish agencies for War Relief and Salvation Army be also included in the same campaign. While this was not in accord with the wishes of Dr. Mott and the War Council of the Y. M. C. A., the official request of the head of the Government was properly considered conclusive, and the great November Drive will be conducted in the united interests of these seven organizations, all of whom are represented on the Committee having the campaign in charge.

The minimum sum which the people of the United States will be asked to give at this time for the comfort and moral safeguarding and uplifting of our forces through all these agencies is $170,500,000. This amount will be divided as follows: Y. M. C. A., $100,000,000; Y. W. C. A., $15,000,000; Camp Community Service, $15,- 000,000; American Library Association, $3,500,000; Salvation Army, $3,500,000; Jewish Welfare Board, $3,500,000; National Catholic War Council, $30,000,000.

This is a large amount of money to be, not loaned or invested, but contributed outright in one short week. But it is not more than our people will gladly give for the sake of our men engaged in fighting for us and our country and for humanity, if only they undertake it with a united purpose and a common spirit of sacrifice. They have only to realize how necessary and how beneficent the work is, how dependent our soldiers are upon it for their morale as well as their comfort and general welfare—for that spirit of pluck and fortitude and high courage which can only be maintained by the knowledge that the nation at home is behind them and is reaching out to them the helping, cheering hand by these agencies that touch them so closely and in such homely and practical ways. Let the people understand this, and that spirit of loyalty and devotion which has already stood so many tests will respond again with a singleness of purpose and a willing spirit of sacrifice that will accomplish the end and more.

But there must be no diversities of purpose or divisions of heart in the matter, lest disaster overtake us. We have noticed with extreme regret, even in a quarter where it would be least expected, a disposition to criticize and disclaim sympathy with the President's request that all seven of these organizations be included in a single campaign for funds, and elsewhere a resentment openly expressed that sectarian or religious differences must be ignored in the appeal for this war work. Statements have been made and circulated in this connection which were antagonistic and unpatriotic at least, and that verged closely upon disloyalty. We trust that calmer consideration will put all such utterances to silence; or if not, that they will meet with the prompt rebuke which they deserve from all broadminded and patriotic men. Unity of purpose and sentiment is essential in this great undertaking upon which the fitness, the moral stamina and final success of our armies so largely depends. A fine field indeed would be open to Prussian propaganda if denominational prejudice and religious animosity can be appealed to for sowing discord and contention among us in such a crisis.

For ourselves, we believe that the President was perfectly right in his decision. Besides the practical considerations by which he was, no doubt, guided and which he, as the head of the government, was in the best position to understand, the moral effect of this single, united campaign ought to be of the finest. Here is a thing, a great patriotic, humane and benevolent movement with its distinctly spiritual and religious element, in which all right-minded men can unite with one concerted purpose. Jew and Gentile, Romanist and Protestant, Churchman and Salvation Army drummer can work together in this common cause. For once, "diversities of administration" are to be subordinated to sameness of spirit. It is a condition that ought to be welcomed and magnified. It will speak in loudest tones of that trust of all liberty which only the Spirit of the Lord can give, liberty from the bonds of prejudice, bigotry and selfishness of aim. Mutterings of discontent at such a time, intimations that our religious liberties are being attacked and resentment that our inalienable privilege of hating and devouring one another under the cloak of religion is being discounted and for the moment is sought to be held in abeyance, is little less than open disloyalty to the country and to humanity.

To a Correspondent in Maryland, troubled by novelties which she has observed in teaching and in worship, we would say that neither of the customs of which she writes prayers for the dead and bowing toward the Holy Table, is forbidden by any law or rubric of the Church and neither of them has received the sanction of this Church. They cannot, therefore, be inculcated or practiced as parts of the Church's authorized worship. As private practices or acts of devotion the Church has, of course, nothing to say in regard to them, though her judgment may be properly inferred from their omission from her formularies of worship.

Directions in regard to the use of the Litany and other services are found on page VII of the Prayer Book. The Church has never "given up" either the Litany or Ante-Communion service nor prescribed any particular hour for their use.

Just as you now play without the music and do not think what notes you strike, though once you picked them out by slow and patient toil, so if you begin with set purpose, you will learn the law of kindness in utterance so perfectly, that it will be second nature to you, and make more music in your life than all the songs the sweetest voice has ever sung.—Frances E. Willard.

HERE AND THERE.

Our readers may remember an article on Christian Stewardship, addressed by the Bishop of California to his Diocese and published in the Southern Churchman perhaps two years ago. The good Bishop is still seeking to lead his people to a realization of his ideal in this regard, and a second Diocesan Conference on Stewardship was to have been held in Oakland last Sunday, September 22. Bishop Nichols writes in this connection:

"The word translated 'stewardship' is almost the exact counterpart of our word 'economy.' And the use of it is as comprehensive as that of St. Paul's whole ministry (Col. 1:25) and as technical as in the case of the unjust steward (St. Luke 16:2). Broadly speaking then our Christian Stewardship covers all we have at our disposal from God in terms of economy or making the most of it. It covers right use of our time, our faculties and our property. In this sense the Christian steward is the Christian economist. It is required that he be found faithful to all he is and all he has, as one that must render an accounting under the unerring audit of his God. His whole life is a sacred trust and squandering any part of it will be sure to find him out. It is an economy in which the waste is the most woeful thing in life."

Hunting for Mare's Nests is a favorite pursuit of some people, and strange discoveries are not infrequently made. We are told that the Rev. Dr. Mark A. Matthews, of Seattle, who leads a large Christian element of the ultra orthodox type, professes to see a tendency in America toward a union of Church and State. He makes no charge against religious bodies in America which, in Europe, are linked up with governments, but hints rather that there is an active movement here that is laboring to put churches under government control. He says the propaganda is organized, and that it aims at a permanent arrangement, not merely for the period of the war. He professes to fear that the judgment of some otherwise worthy persons is warped by the spectacle of government control of railroads and telegraphs, of shipping and mines, of food and fuel. He reminds that it is easy to drift into such plan, but may take a revolution to untangle it.

What a wonderful opportunity the war news of this week offers to teachers of Bible classes to bring their studies of the past into close touch with the present. General Allenby's great victory over the Turks has brought into the headlines of the daily papers names that we are accustomed to associating only with the Bible or Sunday-school literature.

What do we know of Nazareth, past and present?

What great battle was fought on the plain that General Allenby's cavalry swept over, and who sang a wonderful war-song about it?

What great Israelitish warrior sent his troops to hold the fords of the Jordan, to prevent the escape of a vanquished foe in the same way that the British commander did this week?

With whom is Mt. Carmel intimately connected in the Bible narrative?

The visit to this country of Archbishop Mataxakis of Athens at this time is an event of special interest, because of the recent allied successes on the Macedonian front, in which Greek troops have taken an active part. The Greek and Serbian churches are of Apostolic origin, and although their members have only been in this country since 1900, the present visit of the Archbishop is to transfer the status of the Greek congregations here from missions to self-governing organizations.

The Archamandrite of the Serbian Church has already been in this country for some time, and has no doubt been taking an active part in creating sentiment in favor of the new Serbian, or Jugo-Slav state, which will undoubtedly come into being at the close of the war, and will include, besides the original kingdom of Serbia, several provinces, now a part of the Austro-Hungarian empire, but inhabited almost entirely by Jugo-Slavs.

Americans have always loved to laugh. A striking example of their admiration for a humorist occurred this week, when on Tuesday the Hon. Chauncey M. Depew had the rare privilege of unveiling a statue of himself, erected at Peekskill, N. Y.

Mr. Depew is, of course, known to the country by reason of other talents than that of wit, but it is his ability to appreciate the humor of the situation that has given him his greatest prominence.

In commenting upon the unusualness of the present occasion, he remarked, "Men generally do business with the undertaker before appearing in bronze, but the good people of Peekskill got tired of waiting for me to die before placing my likeness in the grounds which I donated to them for a public park."

Vigorous steps are being taken by Protestant churches of all denominations for fuel conservation through union services for the coming winter. One of the most striking suggestions is the use of one church at different hours, by different denominations, thereby saving starting of more than one furnace. The Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian churches of the North are at present the most active in promulgating the plans, but it is sincerely to be hoped that other religious bodies will follow their good example.

Social Service Commissions of the Episcopal, Congregational and Disciples' bodies have already acted in the matter of saloon substitutes. Their action was hastened by the Government's unexpectedly quick decision to end beer making on December 1. Members of these commissions expect that this action will become permanent and will outlast the duration of the war. Therefore, it is important that something should be furnished of a healthy, clean character to take the place of the saloon as a social center, and it is very important that plans with this end in view will rapidly materialize.

The churches cannot stand idly by and watch the progress of the Fourth Campaign for a Liberty Loan. Material is now being prepared and will go forward this week from Washington, furnishing data for sermons and addresses on this subject and the minister who does not avail himself of this opportunity to present to his congregation the tremendous issues now at stake must be looked upon as a slacker.

"An end to war once for all" is the slogan of the present campaign, and the bonds might well be christened "Brotherhood Bonds," since the ultimate object for which this money is being raised is to secure permanent peace to the world, and a widening brotherhood of mankind based upon equity and justice and maintained by an international army and navy.

The Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh has passed a resolution urging the United States Government to take over the 50,000 idle men now imprisoned in the various penal institutions of this country and to use them in some form of useful and industrial production. The action of so influential a body should have considerable weight in bringing about this sensible and practical step, which will undoubtedly be of great advantage, both to the Government and to the prisoners.

A Southern clergyman, writing to the New York Times expresses what we have all felt as we read the newspapers in these days. They remind us of an obnoxious small boy who has just learned to use some bad words and is proud of the accomplishment.

As to "Fighting Like Devils."

The attention of newspaper reporters should be called to the gross impropriety of describing the fighting of our boys in France in terms of the infernal regions: "They fought like devils," &c.

Of course, devils fight hard and furiously, but they always lose out in the end. The heavenly hosts also fight still harder and more furiously, with a righteous fury, and they beat the devil every time. It would be all right to describe the Germans as "fighting like hell," "fighting like the devil." That is the exact style of their performance. And they will surely go down in defeat. Our boys, whether they know it or not, are fighting "on the Lord's side" in this great war. So let us describe them as "fighting like heaven," "fighting like the heavenly hosts," "fighting like angels" or "archangels." It would sound better, and be a truer description of their style and spirit.—Nelson P. Dame.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC ON UNITY.

Mr. Editor: In a quotation in the last issue of "The Christian Union Quarterly" from your paper, you deplore the small success of a recent movement toward unity. The question is a tremendous one, so mistakes must be made in settling it. It is a great blessing that the religious press and leading ministers see the necessity of unity. The masses will be educated to it and demand it. Prayer, humility, toleration will bring God's help. With His help nothing is impossible. Each year Catholics during the Octave of Peter and Paul pray with you for the reunion of God's children. Only a united Church can win the world for Christ.

Yours for reunion,
RAYMOND VERNIMONT,
Catholic Priest.

"A BETTER SYSTEM."

Mr. Editor: I call the attention of the bishops, clergy and thoughtful lay people to the series of articles by myself, under the title, "A Better System"—which are now concluded. Specially I would invite their thoughtful criticism of the two closing articles, "Suggested Remedies" and "Summary and Conclusions." It is easy to find fault with any system. How we can improve it, eliminate the faults and put in practice something that is better is more important.

Bishop Lloyd and others have expressed an interest in the subject of these papers. Expressions of sympathy, and especially of any practical suggestions to help in the great missionary cause of the Church are invited.

A LAYMAN'S VIEW ON THE PENSION FUND.

Mr. Editor: Will it be possible to give more and extended space to a discussion of the Church Pension Fund? To many of us laymen it is an exceedingly vital question, regarding which we have decided opinions, and which it may not be out of place to frankly present. And in doing so, may I call attention to the fact that our motives are and must be wholly disinterested. We will not starve with the discarded, nor feast with the elect. But even though insignificant foot soldiers, we feel that we have an interest in the welfare of our organization and in the funds we have given for its maintenance.

Somehow most of us have an idea that the Esquimaux principle of abandoning the aged and infirm is somewhat barbaric, and an attempt to incorporate any scheme that is like it, let us mildly say, only in appearance, is rather abhorrent to our ideas of Christian practice and to such injunctions as avoiding evil appearances.

There is no need of recounting the history of the Pension Fund. There seems to be no question that those who knew the details of the proposition were aware of the fact that it was primarily intended only for those who were able to earn a stipend on March 1, 1917, and were so engaged, while those unable, would not secure its benefits. Little seems to have been said during the campaign as to these limitations of the Fund and a careful perusal of the official pamphlet, "The Plan," published at the time, fails to show any statements to enlighten the populace in this regard. Probably the other publications distributed so freely were similarly lacking. But while in the light of recent events this is strikingly apparent, let us say that in an endeavor of the kind, it was natural to dwell upon the benefits and forget the deficiencies. Consequently many of us, not in the councils of the Trustees and conversant with their plans, were unaware that we were providing for those who could work and were not aiding, and in fact, were eliminating those who by reason of age and disability, could not secure a livelihood. Indeed, had we known it, I have a strong suspicion we would not have backed the project.

However, let us admit that our ignorance or misunderstanding was inexcusable, and that our expectations outweighed our caution. We did back the project as we were able, and the widows' mites were as gratefully acknowledged as the millionaires' thousands.

There is one point, however, a good many of us cannot quite fathom, and so far as we know has never been satisfactorily explained. Experts heralded as the best in the world concluded that $5,000,000 was sufficient to provide for the first payments to the active workers retiring after March 1, 1917, until the regular sources of income produced the necessary revenue to meet the outlays. But something over $8,500,000 was secured by the campaign, and we wonder what about that unneeded $3,500,000. We understand that it has, in effect, been invested, and will in due time provide an additional rosy tint to the future of the present active elect. But, while we were ignorant of the fact that the active workers were to be the beneficiaries, and the needy incapacitated were to be allowed to suffer, we understood this money was required and necessary to be primarily expended for relief and not used as a sinking or endowment fund. Why isn't it so used, and why cannot this enormous surplus be utilized for the relief of those many of us consider are by far the most needy and the most entitled to assistance?

My inquiries along this line have failed to result in definite information. I have been told vaguely that conditions of some unknown character have been discovered which require the Pension Fund to keep this surplus. That is a rather hard stab at the reputation of those world experts who were employed to investigate and decide on a scientific plan in advance. It has also been intimated that this agitation is being fostered by certain brethren of the cloth with easy consciences who are correctly outside the pale, but are now anxious to partake with their more fortunate brothers. That doesn't apply to me, and in any event that line of argument is irrelevant, so long as there is one worthy man kept out and there are undoubtedly such men. Indeed, it is not impossible some unworthy ones are already seated at the upper table, but I doubt if many of the technically qualified have abandoned the vlands that are being served to them, on that account.

In this connection, it is important to ascertain what was the intention of the Trustees of the Pension Fund regarding any surplus that might be raised, and which as we find was over three and one-half million? It seemed impossible to get very much satisfaction from authoritative sources and one was therefore bound to reach the only charitable conclusion that the Trustees felt themselves legally bound to keep this unnecessary surplus for the lucky beneficiaries. Recently, however, there has come into my possession a letter written by the Secretary of the Church Pension Fund in answer to an inquiry made during the campaign for the funds by a retired incapacitated clergyman. This letter is highly illuminating and is as follows:

"The Church Pension Fund,
"14 Wall Street, New York,
"July 19, 1916.

"My Dear _____:

"When the Trustees of the Church Pension Fund were planning the campaign for the reserve fund there were two alternatives, either to ask the amount which would provide pensions for the Clergy who are in active service when the system begins and for their families, or to ask the larger amount which would do this and also enable the Fund to be retroactive, taking in the cases of Clergy who had retired from active service before the system began. The Trustees felt constrained to adopt the former method, because the amount required—$5,000,000—was so large that, if they asked for more, they were afraid that they would not get that, and also because it was extremely difficult to get the statistics which would enable the Fund to be retroactive. If, therefore, the Church merely raises $5,000,000 for the reserve, we apparently will not have any resources with which to take care of the Clergy who have retired previous to the first of March, 1917, when the system begins. But as we have raised $3,000,000 by the first of July, and as we have always emphasized that $5,000,000 was merely the minimum, we are in great hopes that the Church will be generous and will run over $5,000,000, we hope, very considerably. In that case our Trustees will be pleased to extend the benefits of the Fund backward to those who have retired by reason of age or disability in previous years, but you can see that at the present moment it is not possible for us to make definite promises.

"May I assure you that the Trustees are very solicitous to provide for such a case as your own and that we should be very glad if you would call our attention to it on the first of March next, although our official records will probably make that unnecessary. You can feel certain that in such a case as yours our Trustees will feel very sympathetic and will endeavor, if it is possible, to find resources to do all that they can. I hope that this assurance will soften what must seem a very technical reply, but you can appreciate the impossibility of our making definite promises at this stage of the campaign.

"I am,

"Very sincerely yours,

"MONELL SAYRE."

(Black type mine.)

What more authoritative promise and inducement for the older ones to work for the Fund with a definite statement as to the policy of the Trustees could be made? But when the campaign was over, and not the necessary five, but nearly nine million was in hand, what a change in demeanor took place. If it was not such a serious matter it would remind one of the revolutions humorously attributed to the newly-rich. After three and a half million surplus had been secured, the aged and helpless clergyman adopted Mr. Sayre's suggestion and called the attention of the Pension Fund to his situation, with the following result:

"The Church Pension Fund,

"14 Wall Street, New York.

"June 25, 1917.

"Dear _____:

"In reply to your letter of June 11th, you have apparently misunderstood the basis upon which the Church Pension Fund was inaugurated. The Church Pension Fund was started on March 1, 1917, and stood ready on that date to pay pensions to any ordained clergyman who retired on or after that date.

"It was impossible to make the system retroactive since such an action would have required an initial reserve of four or five times the amount which we felt the Church could contribute. The Pension Fund is based on accurate and exact calculations and with the resources at hand it is impossible for us to grant a pension to any clergyman who retired before March 1, 1917.

"I am sorry to say that this is the only answer which I have the power to give you.

"Very sincerely yours,

"MONELL SAYRE,

"By B. B. LOCKE."

Aside from the marked difference in the tone of the two letters, one written when the organization was seeking funds, and the other when it had them in superabundance, one is struck by the fact that in the letter, the $5,000,000 sum of the experts is forgotten and now somebody's "accurate and exact calculations" require apparently the extra $3,500,000.

While one hesitates to criticize the administration of the Pension Fund, nevertheless such glaring inconsistencies between acknowledged purposes and present practice by an organization operating under and within the Christian Church is seemingly open to serious question. I dislike to think that this body is operating on the ancient theory that it is free to do as it pleases, because being a corporation, it has "neither a body to be kicked, nor a soul to be damned." And yet from present appearances, it looks as though, having become established in the Church and having secured a superabundance of resources, with the complete right of administration, it has adopted a narrow line of action and intends to carry it out with that soulless and autocratic method of modern efficiency which disregards the equities, wishes, or, indeed, the rights of others who helped to make it. Personally, I believe the principle cannot be successfully incorporated as a part of Christian practice.

What is to be done? Notwithstanding the storms of protest, the Pension Fund will neither loosen up its hold on the excess funds, and distribute them as right seems to dictate, nor explain its position. The variance between its promises when seeking aid and its practice when supplied, as indicated above, is not to its credit. Can it be that those world famous experts overlooked the most fundamental principles of their business and were nearly 100 per cent off in their calculations. 14 Wall Street stands a modern sphinx to all inquiries as to why this surplus will not or cannot be utilized in direct relief to the Clergy who were retired prior to March 1, 1917.

What is to be done? We recognize the probable right of the Pension Fund, if it so desires, to handle the $5,000,000 with all the marvelous machine-like efficiency at its command in taking ample care of the favored ones. But the stockholders, even though they be minor ones, feel that they should have a voice in the institution, and especially with regard to the disposition of the surplus. At least they are entitled to some word of explanation as to why their wishes with respect to the omitted ones will not or cannot be carried out.

Since originally drafting my letter there has been sent to me, Bulletin Number One of the Pension Fund, and this to my mind only accentuates the situation. I read in the preliminary statement the following:

"On March 1, 1917, the Trustees of the Church Pension Fund took up their active duties. On that day the Clergy ceased entirely to be in the charitable class; they passed over to the contractual and self-respecting basis of modern society."

"The importance of the remarkable response to the pension assessments lies in the fact that it carries out the central idea of the Church in establishing the Church Pension Fund. This central idea was to withdraw the Clergy and their families from being in the class of the recipients of charity."

Then after stating that heretofore in old age, or if disabled, they were compelled to become mendicants, the statement continues:

"All of this has been swept away with other archaic things."

But farther I find this statement:

"The list of pensions granted directly consists only of those clergymen who have retired for age or disability since March 1, 1917, and the families of those who have died since that day."

Seemingly, therefore, there is an inconsistency, or possibly clergymen who retired before March 1, 1917, are no longer clergymen. In any event they certainly seem to remain in the mendicant class. True, the insufficient alms formerly granted to some, are doled out by the Pension Fund instead of by those charitable organizations that originally took care of them and there is the important difference that there is no hope of increase, while for those others who receive nothing and may become needy and who could have obtained such alms from the original organizations, they are now without hope of aid.

In the meantime as I understand it the Pension Fund has created various accounts for the relief, not of clergymen, but of Dioceses, from burdens they had assumed and are responsible for. And the surplus has been portioned out among these accounts—not, however, to be spent—but as near as I can estimate it, as loaned capital to be returned for the future gratification of the working Clergy. This is all very interesting, but I think decidedly aside from the purport of the point, namely, the equal, proper relief of all aged and disabled Clergy.

And all this time some of the discarded ones are suffering. Something should be done for their relief. If it proves, as now seems probable, that this institution which we all thought was to be so great a blessing to the aged Clergy and an instrument of universal good to the Church, is as a matter of fact only a one-sided crutch, the Church cannot afford to forget the others only partly aided or wholly unaided thereby. Certainly we are big enough and rich enough and honorable enough to make up the deficiencies of our institutions. Let us get together then and organize some measures of relief.

There is a disagreeable story to the effect that the sailors of a Hun U-boat placed upon its deck some helpless brother seamen, the survivors of a wreck, then closed the hatches, and with the working crew safely ensconced inside, submerged. Shall the Protestant Episcopal Church do likewise?

In That Which is Least.

It requires less grace in reality to be a martyr for Christ on a public stage than to be kind and considerate in the familiar intercourse of domestic life, or to maintain a guileless integrity in the ordinary transactions of business. The Christianity that is faithful in that which is least is a more difficult Christianity than that which glows and triumphs on grand occasions. Little love can perform great actions; but it requires great love to gather up the fragments of duty that nothing be lost,

THE NEW DAY.

Extract From a Letter Received by Bishop Darst From Rev. John M.
Robeson, Chaplain of the 119th
Infantry, American Expeditionary Forces.

You speak of my great chance. It is, indeed, and I have been afraid all of my life of having a chance too big for me, and behold it is here. The home folks would be willing to close all the churches and have only one or two ministers in each town, according to the population, and regardless of denomination, if they could only see the vision that is before me. It is in part that which St. John saw on Patmos. "Behold, I saw a new Heaven and a new earth, for the old Heaven and the old earth had passed away." The old ideas of the earth are passing. Men by thousands are losing the narrow, personal point of view and are learning the big brother idea equally as fast. Brotherhood of man—a fair chance and equal opportunity—to live and let live, to honor and preserve the other fellow's rights and liberties. Praise God, the new day is dawning in the hearts of men, and as the day dawns, the way is made plain and the light is sweet and refreshing and the truth as it is and has been revealed in Christ Jesus becomes the chief jewel and most precious of all possessions. In the army, the hour for attack is called zero hour. Tell it out among the chief shepherds and people of His Church that zero hour for God's Kingdom has struck, and all hands must spring forward to the attack that the enemies' lines may be broken and a great victory won for the King. Count not the cost; it will mean much sacrifice for Him who showed us the perfect sacrifice, but we must encompass the walls of Jericho in the name of the Lord, and the victory will be ours for the Christ and His Kingdom. Sinners don't have to be picked off any more as "outposts" by a sniper. They are surrendering by thousands. We fellows who are in are all but swamped, so our appeal goes out through the land—Come over and help us! Just think of being able to get a crowd of six or seven hundred men any week night by merely giving notice of the hour of service and men who are eager and anxious for the message. When did you ever gather such a congregation, four or five times a week. When did you ever have men come in numbers and say we need forty or fifty hymn books for our company prayer meeting; we need three dozen New Testaments for our men? These opportunities ought to be followed up closely, but what can we men do when there are a hundred ways to go at once?

So we go forward little by little, always asking for reinforcements. We are in the front line, and only those know the opportunities in reality. Stir them up. Stir them up, and don't let us lose this chance. If we do, it is our fault, and nobody will be to blame but us.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in
New Mexico.

XIV. Summary and Conclusions.

To sum up what has previously been said, the faults of our present parish system may be stated:

First, it is out of date, antiquated, not well adapted to the needs of the present day. We have come to the days of big business, when nearly everything is done on a large scale. Specially the past fifty years, and even ten years, have seen great changes in the business and the social world, and the Church from its business side (not in any change in faith) should be adapted to these modern changes.

Second, our parish system has a taint of congregational independency, born in a revolt and reaction against Episcopal government. In the days of Cromwell, king and bishop were executed alike. We need now a true Episcopacy, not marred by any spirit of autocracy, but adapted to our republican government and to our modern times, but not thwarted in its work by congregational independency.

Third, because of this disposition toward independency, the parish becomes self-centered. It looks chiefly to its own self-interest. Its energies are directed to building up the parish. Anything outside the parish is looked upon as a sort of charity, rather than as the work and duty of the Church: and therefore.

Fourth, the missionary work of the Church is slighted. Little interest is taken in missions. What should be the great work of the Church is relegated to the background, as of secondary importance.

Fifth. Hence, therefore, in many parishes the slight interest and the meagre offerings for support of missionary work.

To correct these faults in our parish system we need to eliminate the disposition to independency and go back more thoroughly to our own Church principles and to the teachings of holy Scripture.

For the support of clergy, whether as rectors of parishes or as missionaries of the Church, there is a Divine obligation: "they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel." According to their ability all our people ought to make their offerings regularly and systematically for that purpose.

Now because the holy ministry is a life-long work, requiring years of preparation, it follows naturally that there should be wise and careful methods arranged for obtaining that support. There should be orderly system and efficiency. Proper respect for the duties of our holy religion requires this. But the conditions prevailing in the present day show a great lack in the efficiency of our methods.

As this Divine obligation is of the first importance, it is suggested that offerings of the people for this purpose should be kept entirely separate from other moneys; for if funds for support of clergy were strictly kept separate from other Church funds, it would bring about a correction of some abuses. But to do so would probably require a diocesan control of such funds.

To refer again to secular affairs: The postage that we pay on United States mail goes into a national fund, and out of that fund the Postoffice Department is supported. The war taxes that we pay, internal revenue and other taxes, go into a common fund, through which the United States Army and Navy and the officers of the Government are paid.

See again the license tax on automobiles, paid into the treasury of each State and paid out for the improvement of roads. A common fund.

Apply all these comparisons to the needs of the Church. Would it not be wise if the support of clergy were arranged to be paid out of a common fund? Local needs of a parish of course would remain as at present to be met by the parish.

A "general table of statistics" gives, in round numbers, twenty-one and a half millions as the total of annual contributions of the Church in the United States. At least fifty per cent. of that amount ought to go for support of clergy. Divided among four thousand clergy actively employed, this would give an average of over two thousand five hundred dollars for each clergyman, a sum much larger than many are getting. Wisely distributed, there is plenty of money to support all our active clergy.

It is reported of the Adventists that their annual contributions arrange thirty-eight dollars for each member. If our people did as much we would have more than thirty millions each year.

Such facts go to show that there is plenty of money to be had for support of clergy if we have a proper system of gathering and wisely distributing it.

And who should do that work? Certainly the clergy ought not to collect their own salaries. Here is work for the laity. It would be better if each diocese could have its fund for the support of all the clergy of the diocese. Diocesan officers (most of whom would be laymen) would have charge of the work. At any rate, laymen might do much more, and bring greater efficiency.

To sum up then in another way: There is much work in the Church that the laity ought to be doing; in some cases as lay preachers and lay readers, as workers in Sunday schools and in the collecting and management of Church funds. And important work undertaken in earnest will create interest. There are many cases where several congregations should be combined under one clergyman. Laymen should be found to supplement the work and prevent a dearth of clergy. Under changed modern conditions automobiles should be brought into use to enable a clergyman to serve a larger field.

Our parish system is not sufficiently missionary. The farm horse that raises grain and hay for its own food is self-supporting. But a good farm horse ought to do much more. And just so, a good parish ought to do much more than to be self-supporting.

See what a great war has brought upon us. Our country is called to a foreign mission of war. The Church has been able to send only a few missionaries of the gospel to foreign nations. But now our country is sending its millions of young men on a foreign mission of war.

And who supplies the funds? All the people. See the many kinds of war tax. Take one of them—the postage stamp. Formerly we paid two cents' postage on each letter. Now one cent is added—a war tax of fifty per cent. to support a foreign mission of war.

But foreign missions of the gospel tend to prevent war. What a grand field for the labor of Christian young men and for the money of Christian people! Our churches in this country expend about eighteen million dollars each year for their own support. Suppose they were to add fifty per cent. (nine million dollars) each year for foreign missions of the gospel, as our nation adds fifty per cent. in postage on each letter as a tax to support the foreign mission of war. It could be done if our people were warmly enthused with the true spirit of the gospel. There is a great work before the Church in these days well worth the labors of all who will undertake it.

But there is also great work in this land. People of foreign races are coming and have come in vast numbers. The nation and the Church are in danger of being overwhelmed. The Church should rise to meet the situation. More systematic and better methods are needed. Our methods have not been consistent. They have been a mixture. We need one pure, consistent system, not autocracy in the hands of bishops, but a real Episcopal government with a proper share given to the laity and to others.

And how shall any better system be brought about? By legislation? Not at first. The need must be felt.

A beginning can probably best be made through some missionary board. They could require that all parishes and missions to whom they give any aid should be placed absolutely under their control in the appointment of clergy. They could ask that pledges for their support be systematically made and placed under the control of that missionary board. A beginning of a better system could thus be made. Others could follow the example.

In the process of time, some self-supporting parishes would see the beauty and justice of this system and place their offerings for clergy support in this common fund. It may take a long time to bring about such a system, but it is worthy of our efforts.

The Bishops as leaders in the Church should not be hampered for want of means for support of clergy.

In a war among nations great results are due to the commander. Just so in the Church results are due to the commanders in the Church, the Bishops.

They are leaders with great tasks laid upon them. And if with strong will and determination they impress their God-given devotion on the hearts of others, they together, Bishops, clergy and people, make great warriors for Christ and His Church. The Bishop, in the eyes of clergy and laity, represents the ideal of devotion to Christ. He wins the admiration of their hearts by his outlook, his foresight, his care for the welfare of those under him, and also by his courage and tact in counteracting and opposing evil in its many forms.

Such a Bishop should have a strong army back of him.

With abundant financial support (which could be had under a better system) he would become a great leader in power for good.

For this reason appointments of clergy should be by some central, constituted authority, a board of missions or organization in which the laity have a prominent part, and payments of all active clergy should be made out of a common fund.

The present conditions of our missionary work demand a better system. A beginning could be made in some of our missions, and gradually extended as it meets with approval.

The great work of the Church is missionary. Our present parish system has blinded our vision. The whole Church in this land should be aroused and put into effect a better system for the support of the whole work of the Church.

(The End.)

ARMENIAN AND SYRIAN RELIEF.

Reinforcements Soon to Reach Persia: The members of the expedition sent out in May by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief are just leaving Bombay and expect to reach Persia about the end of September, where they will be joined by Dr. Wilfred M. Post, who sailed from Seattle, September 5th.

In addition to eighty tons of supplies already taken by the first contingent, Dr. Post is taking with him 100 cases of condensed milk, a large supply of vaccine, serum for fighting cholera, typhus serum, 34 kegs of green soap, a Ford car and six motor trucks for transport, fifty sewing machines, thread, needles, thimbles and scissors. The sum of $300,000 has also been sent to India to purchase any other supplies which may be needed.

Dr. Cook, who is with the members of the commission who have just landed in Baghdad, carries large quantities of cloth and material for bedding.

From Resht and Meshed: Mr. Murray telegraphed from Resht: "City filled with people from mountains and villages dying for food and shelter. Ask Caldwell cable America for relief fund." I am happy to say that conditions in Resht have been much relieved so that 250 of the 500 tomans that were sent to Resht have been returned to us for use elsewhere. The reason given by Dr. Frame is "that the Jangalis (who have seized the city and are ruling there, their head being Mirza Kocheh Khan), have appointed a Committee to look after the poor and appropriate 10,000 tomans a month from their funds (raised by forced levy) for this purpose."

A telegram says from Meshed: "Many thanks for ten thousand and tomans received. Conditions are daily growing worse. Friends have secured us from a distance at least one hundred kharvans wheat at greatly reduced prices. Carpet and silk weaving industries paralyzed, throwing thousands out of employment. Thousands of families have already sold everything saleable in order to get bread and are now destitute and this condition is increasing daily. Even if this next harvest should be abundant, destitution would still continue till other economic conditions recover and many thousands of families will have no money to buy bread even though it should become ridiculously cheap. Besides the war, the Russian revolution and the failure of crops, the great diminution in the number of pilgrims has robbed Meshed of an important part of its livelihood. There is bad typhoid epidemic here. We are now following plan of giving one meal daily by ticket after investigations of cases. We can use advantageously and economically at least ten thousand tomans a month, but can plan much more effectively if we have assurance of definite amount in advance."

From Hamadan Mr. Allen writes: "Conditions here are very bad. The suffering is terrible, the families without food and fire are legion. Rice we have just bought for 115 tomans a kharvar. Prices are exorbitant for everything. Hundreds of people have no work. Every day we have to turn down appeals for help. There are hundreds that are not being reached, especially of the petty tradesman and laborers who are too proud to confess their wretchedness."

The ordinary investigation of men does not touch the heart of the Christian religion—it only plays around the history of it. It does not pretend to touch the facts; it only assails the record of the facts. Thousands of the noblest Christians in all the ages never investigated the facts of the Bible from the historic point of view. They had the testimony for the Christian religion in their own hearts and fulfilled the Master's words: "He that believeth hath the witness in himself."—C. L. Goodell.

The Great Commission

The Founder of "The Little Helpers."

There died in Rochester, New York, on August 1, Miss Mary Hart, the founder of the "Little Helpers," a missionary organization known in every Diocese and almost throughout the world. The first charter member of the Little Helpers' Society was Miss Hart's nephew, Gaylord Hart Mitchell, who, through her influence, became interested in missions in his earliest childhood. When little more than a baby he helped make the first missionary boxes she sent out, and his delight in being able to be a "little helper" in his aunt's work suggested the name of the Society. He died while still a little child, but his influence has continued in this organization of little children. In his memory a kindergarten was started in Akita, Japan, and from this twenty-one more have been organized in that country.

On the day before Miss Hart passed away the Rev. Charles H. Evans wrote from Japan: "We hallowed the new kindergarten at Odate by a communion service and have named it the 'Hart Memorial.' Thus we commemorate your own loving and long-continued efforts on behalf of Christ's little ones throughout the world, and the memory of your dear brother." The Odate Kindergarten, the twenty-fourth founded by the Little Helpers, is itself a lasting memorial to one whose enthusiasm for mission work has spread the branches of that influential organization through every Diocese at home and abroad.

Bishop John McKim spoke of the Society as "one of the most beneficent and successful of evangelistic agencies," adding: "I want one in every field." So far as Japan is concerned his wish is rapidly being fulfilled. The $1,000 for the last kindergarten in Odate was obtained through the instrumentality of Miss Hart, who wrote letters from her sick room soliciting subscriptions almost to the last day of her life.

"I Don't Believe in Missions."

It is to be hoped that some of those who do not believe in Foreign Missions heard the splendid address of Mr. J. M. Clinton, of the Y. M. C. A., at the State Convention of the United War Work Campaign yesterday morning. This extensive traveler told how nation after nation in the Orient had come to the side of the Allies in the great war, and while he was not emphasizing the point it was perfectly evident that the foreign missionaries we have sent out and who have unselfishly and bravely done their work for Christ contributed in no small degree to this end. The urgency and inspiration have been marked where the missionaries have laid the foundation. One listening to the tribute which he paid to the loyalty of these people to our country felt that all the efforts and contributions we have made to this cause are being more than repaid in the response which our cause is meeting with in the Far East.

President Taft once said in a sharp criticism of those who do not believe in Foreign Missions: "Such a conception is outgrown; it does injustice to the men and women who carry the flag of Christian civilization, who give a tendency to individualism and thus to popular self-government the world over, and who are putting into practical operation before the eyes of those they would influence the beneficent doctrine of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. They are the pioneers of Christian civilization."—Raleigh News and Observer.

His Lamp Was Going Out.

Bishop Funsten and one of his missionaries were standing at a gasoline tank, patiently waiting for their chauffeur to come and take the Bishop to M_____ for evening service. A traveler came along and looking at the Bishop inquired, "Can I get some oil?" "My good man," said the Bishop, with a twinkle in his eye, "I am very sorry but I haven't any to spare; you know I must keep my own lamp trimmed and burning. But perhaps Mr. _____, referring to the clergyman, can help you out."

"I am sorry, brother," said the clergyman, "but my lamp was just about out when the Bishop came last night."

"Oh, yes, I see," said the stranger, and beat it.

International Christian Forces.

Interdenominational co-operation is growing in America and Great Britain through the Federal Council of Churches and other inter-church movements. International Christian co-operation has also been fostered by the World Missionary Conference, the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, the World's Society of Christian Endeavor and other organizations.

The war is bringing Christians together in unusual ways, as, for example, in sending a deputation to the allied forces in Europe from the Young Men's Christian Association of Japan. Ambassador Morris, speaking at a mass meeting in Tokyo, said: "The Japanese Y. M. C. A. deputation to the European front is almost as significant as the first mission sent to the West by the Tokugawa Government over fifty years ago. By that mission Japan signified her intention to end her isolation and join the Western peoples in their forward march. To-day, I believe this deputation means that you are resolved to take your place alongside the men of the West in standing for brotherhood and fair play and international law and righteousness."—Missionary Review of the World.

The Liberty Loan Arms Our Soldiers.

The subscribers to the Liberty Loans have purchased for the War Department over $4,000,000,000 of ordnance—$1,000,000,000 was spent for artillery; $300,000,000 for automatic rifles; $100,000,000 for small arms; nearly $2,000,000,000 for artillery ammunition and $340,000,000 for small arms ammunition; $100,000,000 was spent for armored motor cars.

It is estimated that $7,000,000,000 will be spent by the Ordnance Department this current year.

Every American wishes to have a part in winning the war and supporting our soldiers who are fighting our battles in France. Every subscriber to the Fourth Liberty Loan will have a part in the great achievements that the American Army is accomplishing, and in the achievements which the greater American army will accomplish next spring.

Synod of the Province of Sewanee Called Off.

The Convention of the Synod of the Province of Sewanee that was to have been held in Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville, Ky., on November 9th, 10th and 11th, has been called off.

This Province covers the territory south of the Ohio River to the Gulf, and from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic coast. It comprises sixteen Dioceses. Last year the Convention was held at Charleston, South Carolina. It has been called off at the request of all the Bishops, who believe that war conditions make such a step necessary.

It will be a great disappointment to the Episcopal Church people of Louisville, who had looked forward to entertaining this Convention with a great deal of pleasure. This was to have been the first time the Convention was to sit in Louisville. It has been agreed that the Convention will come to Louisville in 1920, and this, in some measure, lessens the disappointment in not having this distinguished body of Churchmen hold their Convention in Louisville in November.

British Visitors Will Speak on Moral Aims of the War in Sixty-four American Cities.

The itineraries announced by the National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War for the Rt. Rev. Charles Gore, Bishop of Oxford, and the Rev. Arthur T. Guttery show that the British visitors will speak during the next two months in nearly every important city east of the Mississippi. The Bishop's tour touches twenty-six places and takes him as far west as Omaha. Dr. Guttery has thirty-eight cities on his list, most of them in New York, Ohio, New England and the South Atlantic States.

Several well known American clergymen have volunteered to accompany the Britishers and speak from the same platforms on the Moral Aims of the War, the League of Nations and Church Unity. In arranging these tours the National Committee has followed the plan that proved successful last spring and summer in routing Sir George Adam Smith, ex-President Taft and other speakers sent out by the Committee. This is to have two meetings in each city, the first an invitation conference, generally a luncheon, limited to the neighboring ministers and a few representative laymen, the second a popular mass meeting on the same evening.

At an informal dinner given by the Committee in New York on September 18 to welcome the visitors, both Bishop Gore and Dr. Guttery emphasized the need of Church unity in this campaign. The Bishop of Oxford, who is an earnest advocate of a League of Nations, said, "The mere brotherhood of nations will not secure the future peace of the world unless it is an universal brotherhood, based on a Catholic Church. In the League of Nations I can see the reuniting of Christendom."

Following are the itineraries:

Bishop Gore.

September—24, Washington, D. C.; 25-27, Chicago, Ill.; 28-30, Cleveland, Ohio.

October—1, Akron, Ohio; 2, Oberlin,

Ohio; 4, Knoxville, Tenn.; 5-6-7, Atlanta, Ga.; 8, Birmingham, Ala.; 9-10, Little Rock, Ark.; 12, Milwaukee, Wis.; 13-14, Minneapolis, Minn.; 16-17, Detroit, Mich.; 18, Pittsfield, Mass.; 19-20, Boston, Mass.; 22, Youngstown, Ohio; 23, Rochester, N. Y.; 24, Hartford, Conn.; 25, Bridgeport, Conn.; 27, New Haven, Conn.; 28-29, Middletown, Conn.; 30-31, Philadelphia, Pa.

November—1, Elizabeth, N. J.; 2, Ralston, N. J.; 3, Washington, D. C.; 4, Baltimore, Md.; 5-7, New York.

Dr. Guttery.

September—25-27, Chicago, Ill.; 28-30, Cleveland, Ohio.

October—1, Norwalk, Ohio; 2, Lima, Ohio; 3, Hamilton, Ohio; 5-7, Atlanta, Ga.; 8, Macon, Ga.; 9, Columbus, Ga.; 10, Albany, Ga.; 11, Eufala, Ala.; 12-13, Savannah, Ga.; 14, Brunswick, Ga.; 15, Thomasville, Ga.; 16, Valdosta, Ga.; 17, Waycross, Ga.; 18, Augusta, Ga.; 19-20, Charleston, S. The General War Time Commission of the Churches plans to hold its second annual meeting in Washington on Tuesday, September 24.

The sessions will be held morning, afternoon and evening at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York Avenue and Thirteenth Street. There will be a number of reports and addresses, covering fully the various phases of church work in war time, the new problems confronting the Church as a result of the war, and the religious outlook for the future. President Wilson, the Secretaries of War and of the Navy and other government officials have been invited, and the meeting promises to be of unusual significance.

ROBERT E. SPEER.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Woman's Auxiliary.

The annual meeting of the Virginia Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary will be held in St. James Church, Warrenton, November 6 and 7.

Every Parish Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary and its Junior Department is requested to elect a delegate, and to send her name at once to Mrs. F. E. Bowman, Warrenton, Virginia.

LOUISA T. DAVIS.

President and Secretary Va. Br. W. A.

The war work of the Woman's Auxiliary is being organized along the lines suggested by the Church Missions' House. Committees are being formed and the work will be under way by the first Sunday in Advent.

Call to the Juniors.

My Dear Juniors: The summer is over and we are all getting ready for our winter's duties. Some of us have been to Silver Bay, some to the Blue Ridge Conference, coming back with a bigger vision and a renewed purpose in life. Each one of us has, I am sure, taken up war work in some of its phases, and to many of us has come home the thought that our work must be built on stronger and better foundations than ever before, to make good the work of our boys over there.

And so I want the Junior teachers to elect their delegates to our annual meeting in October in Warrenton, of which notices will be sent you later. Make each one feel her responsibility, for it is up to them to take back to those at home the inspiration and the information they get.

The young life of the Church, dependent in no small measure on the Junior leaders for the scope of its vision, will not fail them this winter in the all-important work for missions, neither will it then be tempted to ease up even a little to do the hardly less important war work that so urgently calls. I am feeling, just a little, this pulling of outer lines of work among you. We must keep clear the fact that our missionaries too are on the giving line, and their hands must be upheld.

The call is on, dear Juniors, and the big things to be done by this generation need every young life in our Church. Do not let us let this higher call of the Church find us entirely absorbed in other things, for "except the Lord build the house their labor is but lost that build it."

Our slogan for the winter should be a Junior branch in every parish; a mission study class in every branch; every boy and girl vitally interested and every mission field feeling that vital force. I will hope to hear from each branch along these lines.

Very affectionately,

Your Secretary,

GERTRUDE W. BARTON.

Winchester, Va.

Encouraging reports come from the various Church institutions of the Diocese. The Theological Seminary in Virginia opened last week with twenty-five students, ten of which are new men. Bishop Thomson preached the opening sermon on Sunday, September 22. The Episcopal High School is full to overflowing, having two hundred boys. The professors and some of the advanced students of the Seminary are taking a number of the classes at the High School this year. Stuart Hall, Staunton, opened with one hundred girls, more than it has ever had before in its history.

Leading ministers of all denominations in Richmond were recently called upon by the State Council of Defense to take action to secure sermons or addresses in all the churches on the fourth Liberty Loan campaign. At the meeting held, Bishop Gibson was chosen chairman. All ministers throughout the State will be requested to preach patriotic sermons on the first Sunday in October with especial reference to the importance of the Liberty Loan. It is also requested that the national flag shall on that Sunday be displayed upon or within every church.

The Rev. B. N. DeFoe Wagner, rector of Kingsion Parish, Matthews County, has accepted a call to Christ Church, Richmond.

The Rev. S. S. Ware, retired, has resigned St. Peter's Church, Port Royal, and will make his home in Berryville.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. R. P. Williams.

The Rev. R. P. Williams, Canon of the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, died in Washington on Sunday, September 22. Funeral services were held from the Cathedral on Wednesday morning, after which the body was taken to Richmond, Va., where the interment was made in Hollywood Cemetery, the services there being in charge of the Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop of Virginia.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

The Late John Howe Peyton.

With something akin to a sharp pang I read of the death of John Howe Peyton, the President of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, until it was taken over by the Government.

A scion of one of the finest old Virginia families, he had commenced life as a boy without means, been educated at Roanoke College, forged his way by sheer character and perseverance to the pinnacle of a prominent career as a civil engineer and a railroad organizer and builder. But his energies were not limited to his business and professional successes. He was on nearly every prominent committee of church work in this Diocese of Tennessee, a leader of Christ Church Bible Class, a prominent spokesman among Christian men, a splendid example of regular and vigorous lay activity in the Church. Moreover in agriculture, in the importation and establishment of a Belgian colony near Tullahoma, and in every sort of benevolent enterprise, Mr. Peyton was the type and model of a fine, unselfish Christian gentleman.

I cannot fail to offer this poor verbal tribute to one whom I knew and honored and loved as I did Mr. Peyton.

WYTHE LEIGH KINSOLVING,
Chattanooga, Tenn., Sept. 18, 1918.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Rev. Dr. Daniel I. Odell as rector of the Church of the Annunciation, Philadelphia, will be celebrated on Sunday, September 29. Bishop Rhinelander will preach in the morning and the Rev. James O. S. Huntington, O. H. C., in the afternoon. A reception will be tendered Dr. Odell by the church wardens, vestrymen and parishioners, in the Parish House on Thursday evening, October 3.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop

Bishop Cheshire's Twenty-fifth Anniversary.

Arrangements are being perfected for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the elevation of Bishop Cheshire to the Episcopate, at Tarboro, on October 15 next. The Bishop was born and raised in Calvary parish, Tarboro, was baptized there, was ordained to the ministry there and consecrated Bishop there on October 15, 1893.

St. Mary's School opened September 18, with the largest enrollment in its history. The new rector, the Rev. Warren W. Way, is commending himself as a worthy successor of the Rev. George W. Lay.

The churches at Raleigh and Fayetteville, under direction of the Bishop, are planning to offer religious and recreational opportunities to the soldiers who will shortly be encamped in the tank camp at Raleigh and the artillery camp at Fayetteville.

Archdeacon A. S. Lawrence, of Hillsboro, has received an appointment to the chaplain's training camp at Louisville, Ky., and is arranging his work so that he may avail himself of this opportunity to go into the army.

The Rev. Reuben Meredith, of Scotland Neck, is doing a fine work in his parish, and is also developing several important points for service about him.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

At the recent meeting of the Standing Committee, Mr. Edward Leeson Dielow, of St. John's Church, Lancaster, was recommended to the Bishop as a candidate for Holy Orders. He enters Alexandria Seminary for a course of study this fall.

The Rev. Alan Pressly Wilson, lately in charge of our work at the Mont Alto Sanatorium, has accepted an appointment to Blossburg. His work will include also Antrim and Arnot two places in the neighborhood of Blossburg.

KANSAS.

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

Meeting of the Southeast Deanery.

The fall meeting of the Southeast Deanery met on the 11th and 12th of September at Grace Church, Chanute, the Rev. R. Y. Barber, rector. Every member was present. The program was short and informal. The afternoon session was spent in considering the Every Member Canvass, which will be made in the Convocation some time this fall. The first place will be Grace Church, Chanute, November 3. The Rev. H. J. Harvey, Pittsburg, Kansas, will assist in the work. At the evening service the Rev. W. E. Warren was the preacher. It was a missionary service. The morning session the following day was given to a discussion of the Christian nurture course, which the rector had on exhibition, the Advent call and the missionary and Church school work. It is hoped to have another meeting in February. The Rev. W. E. Warren was appointed to present to Convocation the work that this Deanery should do towards keeping open the silent churches. The Rev. R. Y. Barber was made chairman of the Church school work.

There is a plan on foot to hold a short institute of two days at Chanute, when a few select women from each parish will be trained by Miss Nellie Smith for the Advent call work.

The Rev. Herbert Hawkins, canon of Grace Cathedral, is spending some time at the Holy Cross Home.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Newark Diocesan Journal just issued shows that there are 165 clergymen belonging to the Diocese and 138 parishes and missions. There are 21 candidates and postulants. The baptisms last year were 2,618 and confirmations 2,209; the number of communicants 41,536, with 2,423 Sunday-school officers and teachers; 19,505 pupils. The receipts from all sources $1,049,225.00.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

GREAT TIMES.

The other day two clergymen were discussing a book on the ministry:

"It's a good book," said one of them, "but it is out of date. It was written before the war."

It was a casual remark, made without special consideration, but it expressed a momentous truth, and its very thoughtlessness drives that truth home.

"It is out of date, it was written before the war." How many, many things will be branded with that label. As yet we can form no sort of estimate of the things that will be "out of date" because they were "before the war."

Do we realize as we should the tremendousness of the times in which we live? Perhaps this cannot better be illustrated than by quoting some lines that were found upon a dead Australian soldier in the Gallipoli peninsula early in the war: a man who was unknown in the literary world, but who has left a poem and a prophesy that will be remembered both for its wording and its forecast.

These are the words in which he expressed his vision of the future:

"Ye that have faith to look with fearless eyes
Beyond the tragedy of a world at strife,
And know that out of death and night shall rise
The dawn of ampler life.
Rejoice, whatever anguish rend your heart
That God has given you a priceless dower,
To live and have some part in freedom's crowning hour.
And tell your sons who see the light
High in the skies their heritage to take,
"I saw the powers of darkness put to flight.
I saw the morning break."

Have we anything like a proper appreciation of the greatness of these times? And does that feeling inspire us with the sense of responsibility that we should feel for our conduct, our words, yes, our very thoughts in these tragic hours of the world's history?

These are questions that may well give us pause and food for deep reflection.

A STARTLING REVELATION.

It is now proved beyond all question that the brewers of this country raised a slush fund of nearly half a million dollars, which they loaned to Arthur Brisbane for the purpose of purchasing a daily paper with which to influence public opinion, particularly at Washington, in favor of beer and other intoxicating drinks.

This fact in itself is not particularly surprising to those who know that the liquor interest and other large business organizations have frequently spent huge sums of money to guide public opinion through the press. The startling and interesting feature of this sensational disclosure comes from the source through which the proof was produced.

It was A. Mitchell Palmer, the custodian of alien enemy property, who uncovered this deal and showed to the country the lengths to which brewers were prepared to go to save their business of wasting food and wrecking human lives.

This fact proves more conclusively even than figures that to-day prohibition is patriotism.

Here were some German sympathizers who wanted to injure and handicap the United States Government by preserving intact the brewing business in this country, the waste of which is shown by the following figures:

IF—Why Not?

If coal will win the war, why not save the 60,000,000 tons used by the saloons last year?

If food will win the war, why not save the 3,150,000 bushels of grain used for brewing last year?

If transportation will win the war, why not save the 157,915 cars used to transport beers, wines and liquors last year?

If ships will win the war, why not quit sending abroad the 1,647,777 gallons of whiskey we withdrew for export last March?

If labor will win the war, why not put to work at some essential industry the 100,000 bartenders and 54,000 brewery workers now in this country?

If money will win the war, why not spend on something useful the $2,000,000,000 we spent on drink last year?

PRACTICAL CONSERVATION OF LABOR.

Under the pressure of the need for labor for war work a very wise step has been taken at Washington. We read that "under an executive order announced to-day (September 19), President Wilson authorizes the placing of war supply contracts with the heads of prisons and reformatories at prevailing prices, and directs that prisoners engaged on such contracts shall receive wages corresponding with those paid for similar work in the vicinity.

"Extensive plans are being worked out for making use of the man power of Federal penitentiaries and other penal institutions during the war. Congress already has provided for industrial plants at some of the prisons."

DEVELOPING UNSELFISHNESS.

Nothing is more splendid than the spirit of unselfishness which is being shown by our soldiers in France.

The Rev. Dr. Frances T. Frost, Protestant chaplain of the American Red Cross Military Hospital, No. 1, at Neuilly, writes:

"Many of the boys had to wait while the more serious cases were being cared for first. Some of them had not eaten in twenty-four hours or more. Some were thirsty. All were in pain. Yet there was never a word of complaint. The more they lost the more cheerful they seemed. One boy who had lost the sight of both eyes told me that he considered himself lucky! 'It might have been worse,' he said.

"They get the finest care possible from both surgeons and nurses. It is only while the camions are unloading their freight so fast that all cannot be attended to at once.

"The spirit of the men is a revelation. Naturally, every one expected great things of them. But they have far transcended all expectations.

"It is not pulpit oratory that the boys want," went on Dr. Frost. "It is a friend. The opportunities for a chaplain to serve are too numerous to mention. Why, in one round day in the fifty wards here at No. 1, I write letters home, I run errands and attend to business matters for them, besides being often taken into their confidence in regard to their personal troubles. They turn of their own accord to the man who, they know, is there just for that—just to be their friend.

"One usually thinks of a chaplain at the bedside of the dying. It is there that we have our supreme call, of course. Sometimes they ask me to pray with them; sometimes they would rather that I prayed silently beside them. Often they thank me just for staying with them until the end. They know that I will write home to their parents and it comforts them and helps their passing. And then—"

Dr. Frost spoke like one who has had a revelation.

"Humanity is experiencing religion all over again in the trenches. The deep religious feeling of these boys who have stood face to face with their God 'out there' is beyond description. One of them whom I attended in his last moments said to me, 'Whatever we are we have one common bond—religion.' That man was a Jew! And his words are prophetic."

The Episcopal Church is the Mother Church of the English speaking race. In America she is making great headway, steadily advancing her true principles and winning numbers to her ranks at home, while she is showing great signs of vitality and health in successful missions abroad. The course of the Church in America has been characterized by a very remarkable growth. Some in the Church are careless and unworthy, but for the earnest and true-hearted she provides a training and privilege not paralleled elsewhere.

"The gain of the Episcopalians in this country, steady, onward, undeniable, is one of the remarkable characteristics of our time,"—The News (Roman Catholic).

"The growth of the Episcopal Church far exceeds, proportionately, that of the population at large. It looks like the Church of the future."—Public Opinion.

St. Michael and All Angels, which always falls on September 29th, happens to fall also, this year on the eighteenth Sunday after Trinity. The New Lectionary uses for the former the Prayer Book lessons, except that Gen. 28:10-end, Jacob's vision of the ladder and the angels, is substituted for Gen. 32, Jacob's wrestling with the angel; and Rev. 14:1-14 takes the place of Rev. 14:6-15-end. Of these two changes, the first seems justified, but the latter is questionable. There is certain completeness in the ministry of angels as given in chapter 15. Turning now to the eighteenth Sunday after Trinity, we conclude on Sunday morning the course reading of the book of Daniel from the seventh chapter on. By a mere accidental co-incidence, it happens to be the same as one of the lessons for the feast day. As connected with the eighteenth Sunday after Trinity, the chapter was selected, not, of course, for the reference to Michael, but as giving "the time of the end" towards which God's afflicted people looked for their consolation during the period which is under consideration. For a correlative New Testament lesson, we have given one of our Lord's discourses on the same subject—the consummation of all things—and in which He quotes from Daniel; showing that the prophecies in that book, whatever their fulfillments already accomplished, were not exhausted by that experience. Particularly noteworthy is verse 28, "Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the vultures be gathered together," showing that judgment is a continuous or, at least, a periodic world process, aside from its climatic applications in the eternal world.

Connections with the Eucharistic teachings are to be found as follows: (1) Daniel was one who, according to his lights, "withstood the temptations of the world, the flesh and the devil"; and furthermore, he followed God with "pure heart and mind." (2) Not only was his "strength as the strength of ten because his heart was pure," but his vision was clear for the same reason. Note the same combination in verses 4 and 10 of Dan. 12. (3) As dealing with the consummation of all things, this chapter is also connected with the Epistle ("waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ") and with the Epistle ("waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ") and with the Gospel: "Sit thou on my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool."

In the evening, the first lesson is keyed to Collect, Epistle and Gospel through its teaching on the need of regeneration (the human heart being deceitful above all things), the sad results of trusting in the arm of flesh and contrariwise, the blessings of the man trust in Jehovah. The Parable of the Prodigal Son (rather unfortunately so-called), the second lesson, was selected not only for its two illustrations of different ways of yielding to the temptations of the world, the flesh and the devil (that of the publican and that of the pharisee, respectively), but also to go with the Gospel and its teachings of true sonship as illustrated in our Lord Jesus Christ; in Whom alone we can fulfil the law of love to God and man. The only thoroughly successful way in which to "follow the only God" and with pure hearts and minds is by following the true Son, avoiding both sonship denied (the prodigal) and sonship perverted (the pharisee). Here was One Who was human without being worldly and spiritual without being pharisaic.

The Great Essential.

There is no other way whereby a man can reach maturity of manhood than by becoming a Christian. About every other kind of man there is something defective. Without Christ, a man may attain a very great deal, but he cannot attain everything. The road he pursues may promise well, and may bring him to much, but it does not reach the summit. There are qualities in you which must remain undeveloped, there is a future of perfected blessedness you can never reach, save in Christ. A plant may manage to live in a cellar, but its life will be very different if you bring it out to the open sky and sunshine.

Lord, we beseech Thee, grant Thy people grace to withstand the temptations of the world, the flesh and the devil; and with pure hearts and minds to follow Thee, the only God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

St. Michael and All Angels.

O everlasting God, Who hast ordained and constituted the services of angels and men in a wonderful order; Mercifully grant that as Thy holy angels always do Thee service in heaven, so, by Thy appointment, they may succour and defend us on earth; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Life out of Christ is life in a cellar: it is only in Him you learn what liberty is, only in Him do you find light, life and scope. Religion is not an accomplishment, which you may be somewhat the better of but can get along without; it is not a refuge you may be compelled to resort to, as a man may be driven to enter a hospital, but it is an essential of life. You cannot become a normal human being without it. A man who is born deaf, dumb and blind, and with a very imperfect brain, may live in a kind of way, and you may by courtesy call him a man, but you know how much he loses, even though he himself, from his diseased condition, may look upon speech as a mere superfluity, and may have a kind of contentment to be as he is, never having known anything better. So the man who is not a Christian, and has no connection with those things with which Christianity brings men into connection, is a man only in an imperfect sense, and is by no means like the person he may in Christ become. The great reason why you should become a Christian is simply this, that only thereby can you become a man.—Marcus Dods.

The Peril of the False Precept.

Few men seem to realize how morally deadening is a low ideal. A base precept is worse than a bad example. A bad example corrects itself, because the general conscience is able to condemn an evil seen in evident action. But a low precept creeps into the mind and brings forth a bad practice in the end. If you teach men that to attain earthly comfort, and security and ease are the chief gains in life, and if you go on to declare that unless men have these things they cannot be pure and true and self-denying, you debauch the conscience. You contradict the highest ethical Authority, who condemned these very things, when He said, "After all these things do the Gentiles seek."—Selected.

The Road From Jericho.

Beside the road from Jericho,
Blind Bartimaeus in his place
Heard all the people come and go.

He marked the multitude's slow pace;
Man after man he counted them
By shadows on his sightless face.

Sometimes he grasped a garment's hem,
Shrinking, a little, in his prayer,
Lest one should heed and two condemn.

A long day's toll to gather there
The meagre dole of that day's bread—
Yet only so he won his share.

The fierce noon wearied overhead;
Thick from the road the gray dust beat,
The palm-tree's shadow smaller spread.

Drowsing a little in the heat,
He thought he dreamed that mightily
There swelled a sound of marching feet;

Till sounded on his dream a cry—
Marvel and triumphing and fear:
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by!"

O for a moment's grace to peer
Out of his curtained gloom, a sense
To mark the wonder drawing near!

A guide before this light go hence
And leave him dark unendingly!
He bowed him in his impotence.

"Thou Son of David, pity me!
Thou Son of David!"—ceaseless, shrill,
Till one said, "Hush, he calleth thee."

There spake no friendly tongue to tell What sign should show of that strange power,
What mortal pang might work the spell;

Groping, alone, he met his hour:
And lightly fell the miracle
As sunshine on a lifted flower.

A gentle word across the night:
"What favor wouldst thou have me show?"

"Lord, that I may receive my sight."

"Receive thy sight"—and sudden, lo,
The dear, lost plains, the late sunlight
On the old road from Jericho!

How fair on the horizon's rim
The faint, familiar sunset crept,
How sweet that dark came down for him!

How wild he watched for dawn, to find
The blessed things he used to know—
Seeing, who once had wakened blind!

And Christ of Nazareth, passing by
The last sad mile from Jericho,
Entered Jerusalem to die.

The Old-Fashioned Way.

"Somehow, Aunt Jane, it seems to me as if Jim and I were growing a little apart religiously, I mean. I love him just as much as ever and he declares that I am—well—adorable; that's just his way of putting it, you know. But I'm a bit worried, Aunt Jane."

Miriam sat down on the little cane-seat chair that she used to carry all over the house when she was a wee girl and left behind her when she went to a home of her own. Aunt Jane liked to have the chair in her room now.

It was company for her.

"Just what is the matter, dear?"
Aunt Jane laid down her knitting and looked at this beloved niece through her tortoise-rimmed spectacles.

"Well, you see, I've always been regular in going to church and before we were married Jim always went with me. Now he says he's tired on Sunday morning, and, poor fellow, I believe he is. It's hard to work steadily six days out of seven. So he doesn't get up early, and breakfast's late, and I'm tired, too. We just decide that we'll stay home and go to church next Sunday, because in the evening we're usually invited out to supper. The Blossoms expect us there. You know, we were married in the same month.
Sometimes we go to them, and often they come to us."

The needles clicked again in the gray wool; one would call it vicious clicking if they were not in gentle Aunt Jane's hands.

"Sunday newspaper?" she asked suddenly.

"I don't think it's that, Aunt Jane, though I must confess that to read two of the volumes that we get every Sunday requires time. Jim says that there's so much of importance going on now in the world that we must keep up with the times. But it does seem kind of—well, different, on Sunday morning, with the colored supplement's lying around and Jim so worked up over politics and things."

"Then there are the automobile rides," suggested Aunt Jane.

Miriam looked up at her; her blue eyes as clear as the reflection of the sky in a deep pool.

"We've only been a few times," she pleaded, "on the loveliest days. What's the matter with us, anyway, Aunt Jane, that we don't seem to want to go to church?"

"The world is too much with us," quoted the old woman.

"I guess that's about it. But how are we to keep the world out? It's bothered me so much since I began to keep house. I do so want to make our home a Christian home, where every one who enters feels the influence. Yet it is just like so many others—except this one."

There was a long silence. Aunt Jane was thinking and wondering whether she dared to tell Miriam her thoughts.
Nobody likes to be called old-fashioned by the dear girl whom she has brought up from a baby, and it really required courage for Aunt Jane to speak her mind. A pretty little flush came over her pale cheeks.

"Oh, you are the sweetest thing!"
burst out Miriam. "There was a young artist, one of Jim's friends, at our house for dinner on Wednesday, and I told him how beautiful you were—"
"Beautiful!"

"Yes, because you've suffered so. Do you know, Aunt Jane, he said a funny thing for a man who has lived abroad and traveled everywhere? A regular society man, I should have called him."
"What was it?"

"We were talking about old associations and how certain memories stayed with us all our lives, such little things, yet they really molded character. Then he said, with such a reverent tone, that he never, never could forget the prayers which his father had made every morning when the family were all together. At the time, when he was a boy, he had thought them, well, not exactly a bore, but a sort of waste of time, when he wanted to be out fishing or off to school.
He and his sister used to nudge each other and look at the clock. But all the time his father's voice and his words were sinking into his mind and he remembers them now."

"I was going to suggest," began Aunt Jane, but Miriam was so interested in her subject that she went right on: "You know, Aunt Jane, I couldn't help thinking that if ever there were children in our home, I'd like to have them remember such things as that.
But think of Jim conducting prayers!"

Her laugh was so contagious that Aunt Jane could not help joining in, while realizing that the subject was not a laughable one and that the situation in which these two young people were was one in which thousands of others like them found themselves in these rushing days of the twentieth century, when there is no time to talk with God
as our fathers did.

"I think that you are mistaken about Jim. He has a high ideal of what a man ought to be in his home, and it will be your fault if he does not attain it."

"Mine? Why, Aunt Jane, that's hardly fair."

"He is probably as afraid to speak to you of such matters as you are to broach them to him. It's extraordinary," mused Aunt Jane, "how easy it is for folks to talk politics, or the latest play, but let any one speak of religion, the most vital thing in our existence, and they shut up like clams. Now, Miriam, I have a book here with readings arranged for every day and short prayers. A godly man, studying human nature and its weaknesses, recognized that there were just such cases as yours and Jim's, people who lived busy lives and perhaps didn't know how to pray out loud. Take that home, dear, and to-morrow morning have breakfast a little earlier, and then put your arms around Jim's neck and say, 'Dear, let's begin right.' Jim will be glad, Miriam, yes, glad, Miriam, of the chance!"

"I'll hurry away, Aunt Jane, or I'll not have time to get dinner before Jim comes. And I thank you a thousand times for the book and the advice. I guess maybe you're right about Jim, and maybe I have been at fault, you
dear thing!"

Miriam pressed two soft hands on Aunt Jane's cheeks and a light kiss on her lips before she hurried away.

"How did it work?" Aunt Jane asked her niece a few weeks later when she literally "blew in" on a blistering
March day.

"You mean the little book and—every thing? Aunt Jane, I am so ashamed. Jim said he'd wanted to have a little prayer in the morning before he went away to business, it kind of helped a man to keep straight, and he'd longed to have me kneel down beside him, something to remember all day, he said. And he hadn't dared to mention it because it seemed so old-fashioned, you know. But he was glad—glad. And we're nearer together than ever, even if it is old-fashioned."—Western Christian Advocate.

A Nickel For the Lord.

Yesterday he wore a rose on the lapel of his coat, but when the plate was passed to-day he gave a nickel to the Lord. He had several bills in his pocket and sundry change, perhaps a dollar's worth, but he hunted about, and finding this poor little nickel, he laid it on the plate to aid in the fight against the world, the flesh and the devil. His silk hat was beneath the seat, and his gloves and cane were beside it, and the nickel was on the plate—a whole nickel.

On Saturday afternoon he met a friend, and together they had some refreshments. The cash register stamped thirty-five cents on the slip the boy presented to him. Peeling off a bill, he handed it to the lad and gave him a nickel tip when he brought back the change. A nickel for the Lord and a nickel for the waiter!

And the man had his shoes polished on Saturday afternoon and handed out a dime without a murmur. He had a shave, and paid fifteen cents with equal alacrity. He took a box of candies home to his wife, and paid forty cents for them, and the box was tied with a dainty bit of ribbon. Yes, and he also gave a nickel to the Lord.

Who is this Lord?

Who is He? Why, the man worships Him as Creator of the universe, the One who put the stars in order, and by whose immutable decree the heavens stand. Yes, he does, and he dropped a nickel in to support the cause of his Creator.

And the man knew that he was an atom in space, and he knew that the Almighty was without limitations, and knowing this, he put his hand in his pocket and picked out the nickel and gave it to the Lord.

And the Lord, being gracious, and slow to anger, and knowing our frame, did not slay the man for the meanness of his offering, but gives him this day his daily bread.

The nickel hid beneath a quarter that was given by a poor woman that takes in washing for a living.—Selected.

Michaelmas.

Myrtle Humphreys.

Golden the wood in the noonday light
And rowans grace the mountain height,
While over the slopes and wayside steep,
Michaelmas daisies glorious sweep.
O goldenrod, I sing of you,
Though ripened to golden-brown your hue,
For my thoughts turn home. I long for you still,
O scarlet sumach upon the hill!

Ye pine-crowned mountains, afar and steep,
Where tendrils of the wild grape creep,
Ye rowan berries of blood-red hue,
Surely I shall return to you;
For the noonday sunlight and autumn wood

They sing to me ever that God is good.
O goldenrod, lovely and lingering still,
O Michaelmas daisies upon the hill!

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

XV. Father, Wate' of Earthly Bliss.

It is certainly true that the world owes its sweetest songs to those singers who have known the greatest tribulation. After all, this is not strange. As in the natural world the lily breaks from the mire, the rainbow arches the storm, the snow's white purity is wrapped in dark, cold clouds—so in the spiritual world beauty is born of pain. The inner history of almost every well-known hymn will bear witness to that truth.

A striking example is that familiar hymn, Father, Whate'er of Earthly Bliss. In one sense it is not a notable composition: neither in music nor in literature can it claim a high place, though its fine simplicity and sweet brevity are very close to real artistic merit. It is the spirit of strong resignation, of certain faith and contented trust, breathing through every line, that makes the hymn truly great. And its worth is all the more forcibly brought home to us when we know that the lines were written by a life-long sufferer and are, therefore, the fine flower and fruit of disciplining grief.

Anne Steele, the author, was born over a century ago, the daughter of a Nonconformist minister of England. An accident in childhood laid the foundation for a life of physical suffering, and in her girlhood the sudden death of the man whom she was about to marry threw another black shadow over her days. The loss of her father followed, and the lonely invalid found herself thrown back utterly on the things that do not fail. She bore her lot with resignation and spent her time in doing good deeds and writing hymns and other poems. Dying at an advanced age, her last words were, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

One biographer, in outlining her life, paraphrases her own sweet hymn. Earthly bliss was denied her, he says, but she had a calm and thankful heart, and the presence of God shining through her journey, crowned at last that journey's end.

Father, whate'er of earthly bliss

Thy sovereign will denies,

Accepted at Thy throne of grace,

Let this petition rise:

Give me a calm and thankful heart,

From every murmur free;

The blessings of Thy grace impart,

And make me live to Thee.

Let the sweet hope that Thou art mine

My path of life attend:

Thy presence through my journey shine,

And crown my journey's end.

Practical Repentance.

Sam Colston was only fourteen, and he could neither read nor write. His father was a ne'er-do-well mountaineer, and the home, such as it was, was mothered by an older sister. All the children were well and strong, except Bunny, the youngest, whose crooked back was a constant reproach to Sam. Years before, he had been left in charge of the child, and in boyish thoughtlessness had neglected him. Bunny had fallen from the high porch of the Colston cabin and had suffered an injury from which he had never recovered.

One afternoon Sam picked up a crumpled paper by the roadside in which there were some pictures that attracted his attention. He could make nothing out of the printed matter, but he took the circular to he preacher and listened eagerly to the reading. It was the prospectus of a hospital for spinal cripples, but when Sam spoke of Bunny the minister kindly explained that the institution was hundreds of miles away, and that a great deal of money would be required to take his brother there for treatment.

But Sam set his heart on the project. Railway tickets were out of the question and he determined to make the long journey on foot, drawing Bunny behind him in his little wagon. The scheme was quixotic, but there was no one to dissuade him, and the resolute lad actually carried it out. It was weeks before Sam saw the city of his hopes loom up in the distance, but he kept on doggedly, although the sun was often scorching hot and the stones sorely bruised his bare feet. By a fault of his, Bunny was hunchbacked, and no sacrifice was too great to right the wrong he had done.

The surgeon at the hospital called Sam's exploit a splendid example of "practical repentance," and so it is. The boy's momentary neglect of his baby brother was in itself a trivial fault, quite unlike a malicious blow or an angry push, but Sam's unsophisticated mind reckoned squarely with the result, and manfully accepted the responsibility.

For most of us "repentance" is a technical word that has more to do with theology than with every-day life. We repent of our sins when we accept Christ as our personal Saviour, but our ordinary thinking associates the act of repentance with great sins and great sinners. We do not realize, somehow, that a conscientious, earnest Christian life is literally paved with repentances for a thousand daily offenses, neglects and shortcomings, and that those repentances become effective only as we work them out in a practical way.

We are sorry for the sharp, cutting word that brings that pained look into the face of one we love. But we must do more than be sorry; we must make our repentance practical. Zacchaeus, the publican, was soon cured of extortion, we fancy, after he adopted the rule of restoring "fourfold" to the person he has defrauded. That was practical repentance.—Selected.

SAVE YOURSELF

From diphtheria, scarlet fever, sore throat, mumps, bad colds, grippe, tonsillitis, meningitis, tuberculosis, measles, whooping cough, pneumonia.

Follow two simple rules, which will protect you and others:

Rule 1—Don't put in your mouth fingers, pencils, or anything else that does not belong there, nor use a common drinking cup.

Rule 2—Whenever you cough or sneeze, bow your head or put a handkerchief over your mouth and nose.

The germs of these diseases are spread through the secretions of the mouth and nose of sick people and carriers.

WAR ECONOMY CORNER.

Fruit Sandwiches.

Cut slices of twenty-four-hour-old sandwich bread in one-fourth-inch slices. Spread lightly with creamed butter. Make a filling of equal parts of stewed mashed figs and orange marmalade. Add to each cupful of this mixture two dozen chopped, canned, tart cherries. Press sandwiches together and cut with a fancy cutter. Drain a dozen of the tart cherries, or use preserved cherries. Decorate each pile of sandwiches with a couple of these and lay four around the plate to give a touch of color. These sandwiches are delicious made with "war breads."—Woman's Home Companion.

School Again!

N. B. T.

We romped through sunny June-time,
We played through bright July,
From August dawn to noon-time
We laughed the hours by.
Now hills are gray in shadow,
And birds are taking wing;
While over field and meadow
The school-bells ring.

We hardly heard September
When she came across the grass;
We'd forgotten to remember
That holidays must pass.
O well, we're willing comers—
Gay hearts to work we bring,
There are joys as great as summer's
When the school-bells ring!

Rosalie's Orange.

When father started off for town one morning, he got as far as the gate and then ran back.

"Mother," he called, "I forgot. I brought half a dozen oranges home to the little folks last night, and have just remembered them. Look on the hall rack."

This was good news indeed, for it was a warm day, and juicy fruit would be delicious. So said the five little Mays, as they crowded around the bag.

Mother must take one, of course. They would not hear of anything else. Then five big, yellow balls were grasped by five pairs of hands, and the band bounced out into the green yard, a house being the poorest place on earth for orange eating.

Harry had his peeled by the time they reached the maple shade, and was dividing it into neat little sections. He loved to take these, one by one, and make way with them. The orange lasted longer that way, he said.

Rob thought differently. "Ho, I'm going to suck mine! That's the way. It's just like drinking orange-soda." He was busily making a hole in one end, with mother's knitting needle.

The twins had already turned back to the dining-room for a knife. Lucy had announced that she wanted her fruit cut open and eaten with sugar and a spoon, like grown folks, and whatever Lucy wanted Lila wanted, as a matter of course.

Eight-year-old Rosalie stood twirling her prize around in her little brown fingers.

"Chickies," called mother from the window, "which ever of you hasn't begun on your feast, run, please, down to the store and get me a paper of needles."

Rosalie was off on flying feet. "Mrs Harris," she said, while the needles were being wrapped up, "has June gotten well yet?"

June was the storekeeper's only child, called after the month she was born in, and because her cheeks promised to match June roses.

"No, Rosalie, my dear," the woman answered. "Sometimes I wonder if she ever will be. The doctor says her fever is gone, but she lies so weak and listless, and won't touch her broth or milk any more." A large tear rolled down and wet the package of needles. "She doesn't look like a June flower now, dearie."

Rosalie's own eyes were filling, and she felt for her tiny handkerchief. As she did so, her fingers touched the rough skin of the orange.

"Will she eat fruit, Mrs. Harris?"

"That she will. But if I went to buying her fruit I couldn't buy nourishing food and milk the doctor says she must have."

Rosalie laid the fat orange on the counter. "Will you give her this?" she said.

"Bless your heart," Mrs. Harris replied, her face lighting, "take it up to her yourself. Who'd have thought of such a thing?"

Rosalie trudged up the back stairs and into the small, dark room. Over in the corner, a pair of tired blue eyes opened and looked at her listlessly.

"Is that you, mother?" their owner asked, before Rosalie came out of the shadow. "I can't drink it. Please don't make me."

"It's Rosalie May, and I brought you this," a little voice told her.

The drooping eyes caught sight of the gift, and two hands went out so quickly for it that they almost dropped the yellow treasure.

"Oh, oh!" she cried weakly. "Take off its skin quick!" Her eyes reminded Rosalie of the gray kitten's eyes when it saw a bowl of milk after being locked up by accident in the corn-house for three days. She left June lying back on the pillow, fairly drinking the fruit.

The other oranges were gone when she reached home.

"Now, where is yours, little helper?" mother asked.

Rosalie told her about June Harris. The twins and Harry and Rob listened eagerly.

That evening Father May brought his brood a basket of cool, green grapes. They would have none of them.

"For June, for June!" they cried.

Next morning the little store at the corner received a procession of softly treading children, each bearing, lovingly done up in tissue paper, a huge bunch of tempting grapes.

When June's cheeks began to redden again, Mrs. Harris said to Mrs. May: "It was your sweet children. And the first sign of change came the day that blessed Rosalie took her orange upstairs."—The Mayflower.

The Little Oak Baby.

Austina N. Hobday.

The first thing I remember was the big, blue sky which seemed to be everywhere. I felt very tiny but very secure, cuddled close in Mother Oak Tree's arms. I loved to hear her sweet voice, gently sighing, as she rocked me to sleep.

We had lovely talks that summer—mother and I; and I thought it would always be so. But when the frosts began to chill the air it seemed to me that my bed was not so snug and I missed the warm pressure of mother's arms and grew afraid.

One day I asked: "Mother, have you stopped loving me?"

She replied: "My child, I love you devotedly, but you are soon to go on a long journey out into the world, and grow up into a big, beautiful oak, from the trunk of which you can wave your arms toward Heaven and stretch your feet deep down into the soft, brown earth, and take on more beautiful shades as the seasons change."

That night I cried myself to sleep, in spite of mother's sweet song. The next morning I missed Friend Sunshine's bright face, and I was very cold. Presently the wind rose, and it seemed as though we would be beaten to pieces. Worst of all, I found myself slipping, slipping; then I was falling, I knew not where.

I shut my eyes tightly and even though I got a big bump and stopped suddenly, I was afraid to open them, for I thought when I lost my hold on mother I had lost all.

Something soft brushed my cheek, not unlike a gentle kiss. I opened my eyes, and behold, the air was filled with what I took to be white feathers. They were not close enough, however, to keep me from seeing, quite near, my big, beautiful mother.

"She looked more protecting than ever as she said: 'Well, my child, you are close enough to take my place when age cripples and breaks my limbs. Then you can furnish a home for the birds, and shade for the weary traveller. Now, go to sleep under your white blanket.'"

I don't know how long I slept, but when I waked a bird was singing: "Wake up, wake up. Spring has come, spring has come! Time to grow, time to grow!"

I felt as if I were bursting with happiness, and sure enough, in a short time I sprouted, and had grown a tiny green leaf, and my roots were grasping firmly the rich soil. I was, indeed, a little oak tree!

A Riddle That Solved Itself.

After a hard day's work the boys' raft was at last finished. Of course, grandfather must see it launched; and they rushed pell-mell to the house to bring him down to the creek. Grandfather admired the new raft, even as much as the boys thought it deserved, and that was a very great deal.

"But this isn't the first raft I've seen on the creek this summer," he said. The boys looked at him in astonishment.

"Why, how can that be, grandfather?" Ted ventured. "We're the only fellows that play here, you know; and we never built a raft before."

"The other raft was made of leaves," grandfather began, with a twinkle in his eye.

"Of leaves! What good would that be?" Hal interrupted.

"But it really was made of leaves," grandfather insisted; "of dried leaves and twigs, all nicely sewed together with silk. It doesn't sound exactly serviceable, I know; but it carried its owner very comfortably. He sat on his raft—"

"Sat on it, grandfather!" Ted's eyes were growing wider and wider. "Why, we have to stand on ours. If we sit down, over it goes in a minute!"

"His doesn't, though," laughed grandfather. "He sits and floats all day long, wherever the wind and water may choose to carry him. His meals are brought to him, too—all he can eat. He's a ravenous fellow, a regular wolf for hunting and devouring."

"Is it a riddle, grandfather?" Hal asked, suspiciously.

"Well, perhaps; see if you can guess it! The raft-builder is very beautifully marked, and has exceedingly strong jaws; and whenever a water insect floats too near the raft he is quickly seized in those strong jaws and swallowed before he can even try to get away."

"Is it a frog, grandfather?"

"No."

"A kingfisher?"

"No."

"Is it—oh! what is it grandfather?"

But just at that moment a tiny floating platform of leaves and twigs came sailing slowly toward them down the creek; and on it, looking round with bright, greedy eyes, sat a large, beautifully marked water spider, eager and alert for food.

"There! there!" cried the boys.

"There he comes now—old spider wolf! It is, it is, isn't it, grandfather?"

"Yes; that's the raft-builder," said grandfather, "and he's a bloodthirsty fellow, too. See how he watches for every water insect on his way. He's ready for them every minute."

And when the odd little craft sailed out of sight round a bend, the boys' raft was successfully launched, and grandfather stood on the shore clapping his hands and cheering. But nobody thought to cheer Mr. Water Spider, who had built his raft alone.—Selected.

Doing Her Bit.

I cannot knit a scarf nor sweater,
Nor write a soldier boy a letter,
For I am only five, you know,
And have not learned to write nor sew.
I know, though, I must "do my bit,"
So, when my mother starts to knit,
I hold the yarn, stretch wide each hand,
And very, very still I stand
Until she winds it in a ball,
And never say I'm tired at all!
—Mattie Lee Hausgen, in St. Nicholas.

Two Boys and Two Dogs.

Thomas came running in, out of breath. "I think it's just awful the way dogs fight!" he cried, when he could get his breath. "Dash and a stray dog are going for each other out in the road, and there wasn't one thing to fight about either!"

Father said he would walk straight out and stop such doings, and Thomas went with him, still indignant.

Laurie spoke up from the window-seat. "I know what started the fight," he remarked, "I saw 'em begin. Dash found the stray dog sniffing at an old dry bone that's been lying near the gate for days, and tried to take it away from him. Wasn't that mean, Cousin Will?"

"Did it belong to Dash?" Cousin Will asked.

"Why, yes, I suppose he had buried it weeks ago and dug it up again, but it couldn't possibly have been any good to him, so why raise a row over it?"

Cousin Will said he could not imagine, and put on his hat and went for a drive with father, while Laurie curled up in the window and was soon far away in an exciting story.

Presently Thomas came back and began looking around for something to do with himself, not being a reader like his brother. As he whistled about aimlessly, his eye fell on an old stick of sealing-wax in a corner of the mantel-piece.

"Just the thing to mend my ball with," he said aloud to himself.

Laurie glanced up from his book. "Thomas Lindsay, you know as well as you know your name, that that's my wax!"

"I didn't know anything of the kind," retorted Thomas, swelling; "but if it is, you've left it throwing around here for ages, and I found it, and now I'm going to use it."

Laurie got up and said that he should not; Thomas contended that he would. Laurie confessed he had forgotten all about the article, but that nevertheless it was still his.

A scuffle began, and when three chairs had been turned over, the tablecloth pulled awry and two pairs of cheeks were blazing red. Father and Cousin Will walked in, looking for something they had forgotten. Both boys tried to explain, talking very fast at the same time. Father looked at one; Cousin Will fixed serious eyes on the other. The stick of sealing-wax was nothing but a pinch of dust on the floor.

When the tale stopped for a second, father said, "Thomas, my son, I had to go out again and run the strange dog off with a whip to keep him from coming here and making needless disturbance."

Thomas shuffled his feet, remembering his late indignation. Then he left the room. Father found what he wanted and went, too.

Cousin Will loitered a moment. "What are you going to do about your sealing-wax, Laurie?" he wanted to know. "Did you value it very much?"

"No," Laurie replied. "Fact is, I didn't." He was setting up the chairs and straightening the cloth, but he did not look up.

"Something like the bone was to Dash, eh?" his cousin went on.

"Just like that, I'm afraid," Laurie owned.

"We locked Dash up a while, to teach him manners," Cousin Will went on, thoughtfully.

Laurie gave a long whistle that ended in a sigh. "Whew!" he remarked, "I'm going to find Thomas, and we'll tell father to turn Dash out and count on us not to be so silly next time."

"Come on," Thomas called from the doorway, "I'm ready."—S. S. Times.

To Grow Pickle in a Bottle.

This is an experiment that the small boy or girl will find lots of fun. It will be fun for you while it is growing and fun for your friends after you have succeeded in growing the pickle until it fills the bottle. They will not be able to understand how so large a pickle was ever gotten into the neck of the bottle, which will be many times smaller than the pickle, of course.

Here is the way to do it. Select a bottle at least six or eight inches long, round if you can find such a bottle, but a flat one will do. Go out to the garden with your bottle and find a tiny cucumber that will just go into the neck of your bottle. If you have no cucumbers select a tiny squash, or even a green tomato. Do not pick the pickle, just push it into the bottle and leave it to grow on the vine. Watch it and keep it pushed further and further into the bottle from day to day until it gets so big that it is all the bottle will hold. A tomato or squash will flatten out and take the shape of the bottle if you keep pushing it in. Now when the bottle is full you may cut it from the vine and take it to the house. If you wish to keep the pickle in the bottle for a few months or a year you can do so as well as not. Just mix a tablespoonful of salt with a half-cup of cold water, and fill the bottle full, then push in a good cork. It will then keep as long as you wish and you can show it to your friends as a curiosity which they will all enjoy seeing.—Youth's World.

Riddle.

Riddlemaree, thin and gray,
Fashioned and formed in a wondrous way:
Low on a bush and high on a wall
It lightly hangs, but it cannot fall.
Though often it's full of legs and wings,
It never flies and it never springs;
A breath or a blow, it ceases to be—
Who can read my riddlemaree?

Answer to last week's riddle: A soap bubble.

A Bicycle Run By a Mouse.

The Albany Express tells this story of a strange accident that befell a mouse.

A wheelman hung his bicycle from the ceiling of his cellar, not far from a swinging shelf on which food was kept. A mouse jumped from the wall to the tire of the front wheel, evidently hopping thereby to reach the shelf. The wheel started and the mouse naturally ran toward the highest part of it. It was able to stay on the top of the tire, but could not get enough of a foothold to jump to the wall. When found next morning it was very much exhausted, though still running. The cyclometer showed that it had traveled more than twenty-eight miles.—Presbyterian.

Look Out For Your Face.

"My boy," said a wise father, who knew how to play and be a chum with his twelve-year-old lad, "you do not own your own face."

The boy looked puzzled. He had come to the breakfast table with a frowning, clouded countenance, and had started moodily to eat his food. Everybody felt the shadow of his ill spirits evident in his looks. His father's unexpected words brought him back to life, and he looked up with a half-guilty expression, but did not understand what was meant.

"You do not own your own face," his father repeated. "Do not forget that. It belongs to other people. They, not you, have to look at it. You have no right to compel others to look at a sour, gloomy and crabbed face."

The boy had never thought of that, but he understood, and did not forget. And all of us should understand, and none of us should forget, that our faces belong to other people.—Christian Herald.

French Colors.

It is not generally known that the three stripes of color that make up the French national flag are not equal in width. When the tricolor was first authorized, in 1792, the positions and proportions of the three colors were not stated and such variety of flags was seen that two years later the National Assembly declared that the national standard should be formed of the three national colors in equal bands placed vertically, the hoist being blue, the middle white, and the fly red.

WHY RUN-DOWN PALE EXHAUSTED WOMEN SHOULD TAKE IRON

"There can be no beautiful, healthy, rosy-cheeked, steady nerved women without iron. When the iron goes from the blood of women, the roses go from their cheeks—their charm and attractiveness depart. I always insist that my patients take organic iron—Nuxated Iron—not metallic iron which often corrodes the stomach and does more harm than good. Nuxated Iron is easily assimilated, does not blacken nor injure the teeth nor upset the stomach. It will increase the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, irritable, careworn, haggard women in two weeks' time in many cases. I have used it in my own practice with most surprising results."—Ferdinand King, M. D., well known New York Physician and medical author. (Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.—On sale at all good druggists.)

NUXATED IRON

For years the flag was made in this way; but, although the bands were equal, they never looked equal, owing to an optical illusion, the blue appearing wider than the white, and the white wider than the red.

At last, after many experiments, it was officially decided that in every hundred parts the blue should be thirty, white thirty-three, and red thirty-seven.—Selected.

YOU WILL WRITE A LETTER LIKE THIS.

I wish that I knew which one of the thousands of letters I receive would have the most weight with you, my friend. I can't quote all of them here, but I am going to ask you to read these carefully and then give me a chance to renew your health and make you write me one very much like them:

701 Barnard Street,
Savannah, Ga., Dec. 28, 1910.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C. Dear Sir: As you are aware, in 1909 I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and, of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered ten gallons of your Mineral Water, which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months gained twenty-nine pounds, was strong and perfectly well and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

A. L. R. AVANT, M. D.
Leeds, S. C., March 2, 1911.

I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of rheumatism, chronic indigestion, kidney and bladder trouble, and in nervous and sick headaches, and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the liver, kidneys and bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter.

C. A. CROSBY, M. D.

These are not selected cases nor are the results unusual. I receive thousands like them from physicians ministers lawyers, merchants, farmers, manufacturers and every conceivable profession. I want the satisfaction of receiving such a letter from you. No matter what your complaint may be, dyspepsia, indigestion, nervous headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney or liver disease, or any chronic ailment that has not responded to drugs. I invite you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocket-book. If the water fails to benefit you simply say so, return the empty demijohns and I will promptly and willing refund your money—every cent. Sign below:

Shivar Spring,
Box 64 C, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Water. I agree to give it a fair trial, in accordance with instructions contained in booklet you will send, and if it fails to benefit my case you agree to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return promptly.

A Prayer for Courage.

Give unto us, O Lord, the spirit of brightness and courage. Help us to play the man, and so to help others to face courageously whatsoever to-morrow may bring to meet them. Let not these shadows oppress our spirits, lest our gloom should darken the light by which others have to live. Say unto our souls, "Be of good courage; fear not, for I am with Thee." Say unto our land, "Fear not, O land, be glad and rejoice, for the Lord will do great things." Amen.—Selected.

The Loveliness of the Law.

The commandments of God are the laws of happiness. They are the rules of health both for soul and body. There can be no well-being on earth, and no heaven without them. We have been too long in the habit of thinking that goodness is only goodness because God has commanded it, and that evil would be good, or at least very pleasant, if it had not been forbidden. We have not regarded goodness as the indispensable means of happiness, just as much as breath is to life, labor to success, or water to steam. The commandments are the laws of goodness.—J. Bailey.

As a Man Liveth.

If we look at it truly, his past life just the one thing that a man does take with him when he dies. He takes himself. And that self is the product of all his past experience and action. As an oak bears in itself the results of every shower that through long years has freshened it, of every gale that has toughened it or stripped its boughs, of the sunshine that has fed it, and the drought that has parched it, so a man, when he stands at the end of life, is what he has been made by all its joys and sufferings and actions. That is what he takes into the other world—his own character.—H. W. Beecher.

IN MEMORIAM.

In loving memory of a dear mother and rare woman, VIRGINIA LEE JOHNSTON, who entered Paradise September 25, 1917, at her home in Union, W. Va.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

THE LATE JOHN G. MONCURE.

I wish to pay tribute to one of the best men in Virginia who has lately passed from the church militant to the church triumphant, the late MR. JOHN GASCIEN MONCURE, of King William County. Living in a most quiet country community, this man was but little known beyond the people among whom he lived. His many splendid qualities did not have an opportunity to make themselves widely manifest. The few short lines telling of his passing away and the place of his interment are not a sufficient notice to take of one whose life was so useful and of such vital importance to the people among whom he lived. In 1890 I became the rector of St. David's, King William. Mr. Moncure was on the vestry, and an active worker in the parish. For three years I was thrown intimately with him. After his marriage to Miss Louise Pollard, of "Edgehill," I was frequently his guest in their hospitable home. His manner was always that of a quiet Christian gentleman in whom one could place the most implicit confidence. With the strong, deeply rooted convictions that made him the cleanly cut man that he was, he had a big, kind heart which made him gentle in his conduct and kind in his speech. The affectionate name of the community for him was "Mr. Jack," and I always spoke of him by that name. He was for twenty-three years superintendent of St. David's Sunday school, and for ten years was lay reader of the parish, also its treasurer and junior warden. During those years of loyal devoted service, many were brought under his quiet moulding influence. Few clergymen have exerted a stronger influence or spent a more useful life.

Many miles away and busily engaged in another field, I have deeply felt the passing away of this man whom I am proud to have numbered among my warmest friends. I sympathize with the community which must feel that they have met with an irreparable loss, with the Church in Virginia which sadly needs such men; but above all with the good woman who has for these many years been his most efficient helpmeet.

service, and the Rev. Robert S. Hooper to like duty at Camp Oglethorpe. Several of the other Clergy have taken services in the camps at home and in France. Thirty of the Clergy have been absent from their parishes in government service for considerable time.

Clerical Changes: The summer has seen many changes among the Clergy in the Newark Diocese. The Rev. Henry B. Todd has entered upon his work as rector of St. Paul's Church, Hoboken; the Rev. Chapman S. Lewis, as rector of St. Stephen's Church, Jersey City; the Rev. Allen Greene comes to St. John's, West Hoboken, October 1; the Rev. L. H. Nugent leaves Lyndhurst to be succeeded by the Rev. F. G. Faber. The Rev. A. Q. Plank has become curate at Grace Church, Newark, and the Rev. Donald Wonders, curate at Trinity, Newark. The Rev. Dwight W. Graham has accepted the rectorship of Trinity Church, Waterbury, Connecticut. The Rev. Roy J. Riblet has become rector of Christ Church, Harrison; the Rev. Hugh W. Dickinson has taken charge of Wortendyke and Glen Rock; the Rev. John D. Kenney of Allendale, and the Rev. William W. S. Hohenschild has charge of St. Agnes, East Orange.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Charles Clarence Durkee was instituted into the rectorship of St. Thomas' Memorial Church, Oakmont, on September 19 by the Bishop of the Diocese. The service was read by the Rev. Messrs. Porkess, Van Etten, Whittemore and Bigham and the sermon preached by Bishop Whitehead. The service was followed by an informal reception in the parish house, at which refreshments were served by the ladies of the congregation.

Connellsville: The church building of Trinity Church in East Connellsville, formerly New Haven, has long been in disuse and in increasing disrepair, because the people formerly connected with the congregation have died or moved away from that side of the Youghiogeny River. Within two years the Rev. Mr. Slayton, of St. Peter's Church, Uniontown, with the able assistance of his curate, the Rev. Mr. Kanaga, has started a mission in Connellsville proper, which has met with hearty co-operation from a large number of people. A very eligible property has been purchased on a prominent corner, a dwelling house on a large lot has recently been turned into a chapel and parish house, repairs being made in papering, painting and furnishing, most of the work being done by the people themselves. On Monday evening, September 16, the Bishop, accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Slayton, Kanaga, Barlow, Goldsmith and Digles, opened the building with a brief service, with addresses, followed by a reception with refreshments served by the ladies of the parish. Everything now looks favorable for the future of this interesting mission.

Clerical Union: The monthly meeting of the Clerical Union was held on Monday, September 16, in St. Peter's parish, Uniontown, with an attendance of twenty-three clergymen. The Rev. Louis F. Whittemore, of Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, read a paper on Church Unity, which was followed by an interesting discussion. The women of the congregation served a very excellent dinner for all present, and after the meeting the guests were taken for a drive to "The Summit," one of the highest points in that mountainous region.

Grace Church, Pittsburgh: Sunday, September 15, was kept as a special day throughout in Grace Church, for it was the sixty-fifth anniversary of the church's opening. A large and representative gathering of the different parish's organizations was present at the early celebration of the Holy Communion. In the Morning Prayer service the Church school attended in a body and united with a number of the parishioners. The rector, the Rev. William Porkess preached a special sermon commemorative of the event. From Grace church two have gone into the ministry of the Episcopal Church. A Y. M. C. A. worker and a graduate nurse, members of the parish are now in France, in addition to a good sized list of young men serving their country.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Bishop Gore of Oxford has now preached three times in New York and spoken informally once. His first sermon was delivered in St. James Church, the Rev. Dr. F. W. Crowder, rector, his second in the Cathedral and his third at Trinity, the last on Sunday afternoon, September 22. At a local conference of ministers he also spoke. He comes to the United States at this time upon the invitation of a committee which feels the need of stronger relations between allied nations in the matter of the future. The Bishop advocates a League of Nations, to have its foundations laid at once, without waiting for the end of the war. Such is the burden of his addresses and sermons.

Speaking of religious conditions in England he declares them to be far better than he would have thought possible if asked in the beginning, and is especially strong in his claim that the Church of England has done its full share in war work, and done it promptly and well. While preaching so far in Episcopal churches he says that his mission is not solely to the Church but to America, and that he will speak in churches of several religious bodies before his return in November. He is accompanied by the minister of a Primitive Methodist body, who has just been elected President of a union of Protestant churches of England and Wales. It is understood that much of his itinerary lies in Southern cities, those which the Archbishop of York was unable to visit.

Deep sympathy is felt for the Rev. Dr. Harry P. Nichols in the death of his son in France. It was only a short time since that Mrs. Nichols died.

Wall Street Preaching: The day the President sent his reply to the so-called peace note, at the noon service in Wall Street the Rev. William Wilkinson moved a vote of thanks to President Wilson, it was instantly seconded by scores of men, and was passed without a dissenter. It was signed by Mr. Wilkinson and Mr. A. H. Lamborn and sent to the White House. The second day after the President sent a letter of warm thanks which he desired should be read to all concerned. The Wall Street noon services are a proof of what the Church could do in our great cities to interest all sorts and conditions of men. The attendance never lessens; the interest and the reverence of the worshippers never wanes.

The services at Midland Beach on Staten Island, N. Y., shows what can be done amongst persons who go for pleasure to the seaside. The men whose deeds are recorded in the "Acts of the Apostles" knew how to do good missionary work when they went to the riverside and held service there. The police kept the boardwalks open for the people when Mr. Wilkinson preached.

CHICAGO.

Rt. Rev. C. P. Anderson, D. D., Bishop.

The New Mission in Chicago: The Church of the Holy Apostles, of which Mr. Franklin H. It requires twelve hours of human labor to grow an acre of wheat. What do those twelve hours of labor yield? Note the result of conclusive tests at the Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station.

One way—without fertilizer—yielded 11 bu. per acre—or a little less than a bushel as reward for each hour's work.
The other way—with fertilizer—yielded 24 bu. per acre—or 2 bushels of wheat as reward for each hour's work.

In other words, these experiments proved that every hour spent in growing wheat on fertilized land brought in twice as much grain as the same amount of time spent in growing it on land without fertilizer.

The fertilizer actually added 13 bushels more to the acre yield, paying for itself over and over again. These are experiment station facts. In view of these facts can you afford to plant wheat without applying fertilizer?

Give the crop the food it needs to build good strong straw and plump the pods of grain. Nitrogen is needed, in addition to Phosphoric Acid. For to beat the Hessian Fly, wheat should be planted late. The Nitrogen enables it to get a good start, even in cold ground, and resist the ravages of the fly.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. A. E. Whatham, until recently the rector of Trinity Church, Louisville, has accepted work in the Diocese of Toronto, Canada, and will leave Louisville for his new field of labor late in September.

Mr. Whatham was also the historiographer of the Diocese. It is understood that he will not give up his chronological connection with the Diocese for the present at least. Mr. Whatham is an indefatigable worker and thoroughly understands the English people and will be a strong addition to the Diocese of Toronto.

Orphanage of Good Shepherd: Mrs. Mary R. Copeland, who has been the matron at the Orphanage of the Good Shepherd during the past year, will retire from that position on the first of October, and will be succeeded by Mrs. Martha McNeill.

Mrs. Copeland accepted the position at a great personal sacrifice and at the urgent request of some of the members of the Board of Guardians when an extraordinary emergency existed. She has held the place when her health seemed to make her unable to bear the heavy burdens the position imposed upon her. She leaves the Orphanage with the heartfelt gratitude of everyone interested in the Orphanage for the sacrifices she has made for its benefit.

Mrs. McNeill comes to the Orphanage with a wide experience. She was formerly a member of the Cathedral, but in late years she has moved out West, where she gained an experience that gives her splendid qualifications for the position she will assume. The Board feels that they are particularly fortunate in being able to secure a person with so much promise.

CONNECTICUT.

Rt. Rev. C. B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. C. Acheson, D. D., Suffragan.

The Clergy who have been favored in having a vacation are returning to their charges, and the work, despite depletion of men, enlisted or called to the service of our country, bids fair to go on with vigor and success.

"Berkeley Divinity School Bulletin" is cheerful in its timely message, just at hand, "That so long as the war lasts Berkeley will have a small undergraduate body or none at all." Nevertheless, it properly intimates that "divinity schools" have "other functions than to be training schools for candidates for the ministry." Inauguration week is to be observed November 5-8. Of the class of 1918, the Rev. Dr. R. Johns is curate at St. Andrew's, Meridian; Rev. R. L. Scofield, curate at St. John's, Bridgeport, and Rev. H. J. Edwards, assistant at Holy Trinity, Middletown. A member of the same class, Lieutenant H. C. Mills, on leave of absence in military service, severely wounded, June 10, died five days later. He was the son of the Rev. S. A. Mills, of Troy, N. Y.

Professor Dearmer, the new teacher in Berkeley, has preached for the first time in Hartford. His sermon was a strong presentation of immortality and duty, as expressed in war conditions overseas. It is a subject which has abundant claims on the attention of all believers, but especially on those who have given this imperishable subject little thought.

The Rev. S. O. Seymour, D. D., rector emeritus of St. Michael's Church, Litchfield, died at his home in that town September 8, aged eighty-two years, and, until three years ago, continued in charge of the parish. He was foremost among the Clergy of the Diocese, and one of the most inspiring of men; the first citizen in the community where he lived.

The Rev. John S. Littell, D. D., of Keene, N. H., has accepted the call to St. James Church, West Hartford, and will be in residence October 1. Outside of Hartford, and yet a part of it, this parish is one of many advantages and of large opportunities. The former rector, the Rev. S. R. Colladay, is now rector of Christ Church, Hartford.

A commendable effort is being made to institute a "Campaign of Teacher Training" for our Sunday-schools. Any method that will surely improve conditions will be accepted upon its merits. It may be necessary to make less of some small things, and a great deal more of some great things.

Personal Notes

The Rev. R. S. Stringfellow, of Kellog, Idaho, will become missionary in charge of the Church of the Redeemer, Salmon, Idaho.

The Rev. O. T. Porcher has resigned the charge of the churches at Darlington and Hartsville, S. C., and accepted a call to St. Paul's Church, Bennettsville, S. C.

For the present the address of the Rev. J. W. Bleker, is the Rectory, Fernandina, Florida.

The Rev. John London has resigned

the churches at Orangeburg and Fort Motte, S. C.

The Rev. Leonard H. Burn, curate at the Church of the Holy Communion, St. Louis, since last January, has accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's Parish, St. Louis, and begins his work there October 1.

The Rev. Thomas F. Opie, of Pulaski, Va., has decided to remain in the Diocese of Southern Virginia, and has declined the call to become vicar of Epiphany Church, St. Louis.

The Rev. A. G. Van Elden has resigned as rector of Trinity Parish, Hannibal, Mo., and has accepted the rectorship of St. Philip's Parish, Joplin, in the Diocese of West Missouri. Mr. Van Elden assumed his new duties as rector at Joplin, September 22.

The Rev. Verne Stover, M. D., who for about a year has been in the Y. M. C. A. war work, assigned as special religious ward visitor at Base Hospital, Camp Pike, Little Rock, Ark., has resigned and accepted the call to St. Paul's Parish, Batesville, Ark. The family is in residence at the rectory since September 1.

Deaths.

The Rev. Harold Arrowsmith, of New York, and formerly of Geneva, Switzerland, and Lenox, Mass., died Sunday, September 15, in New York, following an operation. He leaves a widow and two sons, the Rev. H. N. Arrowsmith, of Baltimore, and Leighton M. Arrowsmith, of South Africa, and one daughter, Miss Mary N. Arrowsmith, who is with the Y. M. C. A. in France.

The man God uses is not the one who spends most of his time in looking for an easy place.—Ex.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department.

Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc. Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Sin will behave itself a year to have its way an hour.

To know God well, is to know that He is doing all things well.

In youth we learn, in age we understand; to grow old is to receive sight.

The man who feels no interest in missions may well doubt his own conversions.

Making conscious intercession for others is making unconscious intercession for ourselves.

The Christian, on his knees, knows more and can see farther than the philosopher on tiptoe.

Ideas are dangerous, but the man to whom they are dangerous is the man of no ideas.—Chesterton.

Christ went about doing good. Too many of His professed followers sit down in a warm room and talk about it.

"We have the guns now, and the men, and ammunition, what we need now is a nation on its knees."—Lord Roberts.

Scorn not the uncouth pilgrim lest you, too, my brother or sister, be of the snobs and flunkies and fools among whom angels have wandered unrecognized.

I slept, and dreamed that life was Beauty;

I woke, and found that life was Duty. Was thy dream then a shadowy lie? Toil on, sad heart, courageously, And thou shalt find the dream to be A noonday light and truth to thee.

—E. S. Hooper.

Affection is intended either to correct our sins, or to conduct us into a life ampler, purer, more wisely ordered, more happily conditioned; and it is only as we recognize this meaning and aim that we can endure to consider the pains, wrongs and miseries of which the world is full.

What it is to find God or to be found every devout man knows, but the secret cannot be told. We feel His touch and we know that the unseen hand can be only His. There is a power upon us, and we need no visible sign or symbol to assure us that it is the power of the eternal. A light shines; we know that it is divine.—R. W. Dale.

Our prayers for restored health, for safety from impending danger, for relief in famine or other distress, are in line with the divine will, for they are the heart's hurry-call for heavenly aid from Him who has promised all things needful to those who sorely need His aid, and His Word stands that He "will never leave nor forsake thee." Faith begets faith; therefore, pray for greater faith, and having prayed in Jesus' name, rest assured your petitions will be heard, and that they will be heard, and that they will be answered perhaps in a way you did not anticipate.—Christian Herald.

Long the road
Till Love came down it!
Dark the life
Till Love did crown it!
Dark the life
And long the road,
Till Love came
To share the load!
For the touch
Of Love transfigures
All the road
And all its rigors.
Life and death
Love's touch transfigures.
Life and death
And all that lies
In between Love sanctifies.

—John Oxenham.

The Great Record.

Whatever place men may give Jesus in their thought, they all admit that the records of His life set forth His supreme purpose as the revealing of the Fatherhood of God, the leading of men back to Him and to His obedience, the giving to them of new motives for doing God's will, and their inspiration, and comforting with the quenchless hope of a life to come.—W. Bid Me Good-Bye.

Bid me good-bye. No sweeter salutation
Can friendship claim;
Nor yet can any language, any nation,
A sweeter frame.

It is not final, it forbodes no sorrow,
As some declare
Who, born to fretting, are so prone to borrow
To-morrow's share.

Good-bye is but a prayer, a benediction
From lips sincere;
And breathed by thine it brings a sweet conviction
That God will hear.

Good-bye. Yes, "God be with you"— prayer and blessing
In simplest phrase;
Alike our need and His dear care confessing
In all our ways.

However rare or frequent be our meeting,

However nigh,
The last long parting, or the endless greeting,
Bid me good-bye.

—Selected.

The Deathless Word.

We go on speaking after we are dead. This is a very solemn thought. What will be the character of the voice with which we shall speak? What will our life continue to say in the lives and remembrances of others? The continuing voice has sometimes been described as the echo of the life and shares its character. But it is far other than that. An echo is only a weak and weakening continuance of the original voice, and it speedily passes into unobserved and unregistered silence. But death does not change life's voice into a fading echo. The life itself persists, vital and positive, radiating quickening or deadening influence. Death does not change character, and character never loses its contagion. We live on, and after death the influence of our life is what it was before.—Dr. Jowett, in the Christian Herald.

FLOWERS FOR ALL OCCASIONS

The Prayer For the Shepherd.

If your minister is to work effectively, you must pray for him during the week. His success is your concern, even more than his; for if he preaches effectively, it will enlarge your knowledge of God, enable you to apprehend God's will more clearly, open up to you new fountains of spiritual strength. I have come to the conclusion, for a very long time, that if ever I preach a sermon that seems to have any special power over the conscience and spiritual life of my own congregation, it is because people in the church have been especially praying for me and my work during the week. What success I have is theirs, rather than mine. Never find fault with a sermon you may hear, if you have not been praying earnestly during the week that your minister may be filled with the Holy Ghost.—R. W. Dala.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

What Is the Liberty Loan?

By Ralph E. McMillin.

It's forts and it's ships and it's shining guns.

It's squadrons that sweep the sea.
It's all of the circling band of steel
That shall keep all the home shores free.

It's grub and it's warmth for the sailor lad

Far out on the wintry foam.
For the brave jack tar, as he fights afar,

It's the good old "Money from home."

It's rifle and helm and it's bayonet,
It's shovel and shard and shell
For the soldier boy in the olive drab,
Out there on the edge of hell.

It's the soaring wings of the whirring planes

That battle on high alone.

For the lad who is daring "Over there"

It's the good old "Money from home."

It's succor and life for a bleeding world.
It's the glimmer of Peace at dawn.

It's the strength of a mighty arm to strike.

It's the gleam of a great sword, drawn.

But, more than all, it's the pledge of love

To the lads whom we call "Our own."

To the boys on land, afloat, on high,

It's the good old "Money from home."

Lord, Send Us Forth.

Lord, send us forth among Thy fields to work!

Shall we for words and names confending be,

Or lift our garments from the dust we see,

And all the noonday heat and burden shirk?

The fields are white for harvest, shall we stay

To find a bed of roses for the night,
And watch the far-off cloud that comes to sight,

Lest it should burst in showers upon our way?

Fling off, my soul, thy grasping self, and view

With generous ardor all thy brother's need;

Fling off thy thoughts of golden ease, and weed

A corner of thy Master's vineyard, too.

The harvest of the world is great indeed,

O Jesus! and the laborers are few.

—M. P. Lowe.

Nothing is so powerful of impression as character. It is not what we say so much as what we are that actually tells for God among those with whom we live. Men are, as a rule, but little interested in mere religious theory, but are inevitably arrested by the translation of such theory into actual facts in the life of God's professed servants. If we would worthily represent Him—which is our high calling—we must put the cultivation of consistent holiness in the forefront of our faith and prayer. And we shall find that God co-operates with all who seek thus to honor Him, and turns their effort into His own victory.—J. S. Holden.

You can often tell what a man thinks of God by the way he talks about his neighbors.—Ex.

Strong, 'mid the blame and reproach of the people,

You moved through the tumult unswerving and still;

They saw not the force that was working in silence—

Till, sudden and swift, came the war-trumpet's thrill.

What gave you the strength to keep silence and courage

Through the passion of men with their world-blinded eyes?

Were you walking with God in the wilderness lonely,

That is trodden apart by the noble and wise?

So stand you today with your hand on the throttle

Of the Engine of power, whose vast strength is hurled

For freedom and justice, against an oppressor—

That blood-sprinkled monster, who gasps for the world.

Yea, loyal in trust to your God and the nation,

Your name on the lips of the faithful who pray—

You will move on, unmindful of blame or of plaudits,

Still steadfast and fearless, your God-guided way!

LOVE AND HATE.

... We need first to clear away misapprehensions and confusions of thought.

Of these the principal seem to be—that love necessarily carries forgiveness with it—that one must forgive before he can be said to love—that the want of forgiveness must necessarily imply hate.

To clear the mind and heart of these we must remember the exact words of our Lord when speaking of forgiveness
—"If thy brother trespass against thee rebuke him and, if he repent, forgive him," even to seven times in one day.

This is our Lord's declaration confirming that which had been declared by the voice of prophets many years before. Repentance must come before forgiveness.

This at once commends itself to our sense of justice, and the more so when we remember the three constituent parts of true Repentance—Contrition, Confession, Satisfaction. The Christian is not required to forgive until the offender expresses sorrow for the faults, confesses himself in the wrong, and makes such full amends as may be possible.

Until such repentance has been shown forgiveness is not required, nor indeed is it possible.

Yet Love may exist and be strong,
may even be strengthened by the recognition of the impossibility of present forgiveness, and the necessity for the continuance of the war. . . .

There remains to speak of the best way, the only enduring way to obtain love, a love that shall last. We learn it from our Master.

"Love your Enemies.

"Bless them that curse you,

"Pray for them that spitefully use you and persecute you."

The ultimate thing is Prayer. Not a vague and general prayer, but for one clear and definite thing, the only thing that can avail at this time—That Germany may be brought to repentance.

God commandeth that all men everywhere should repent.

Prayer for the repentance of Germany is therefore in line with the will of God.

This is indeed the true nature of prayer, our act of intelligence correspondence with the will of God. We have an idea that we know what the will of God is and therefore we pray that it may be carried out. Whatever the thing we pray for, this must always qualify our petitions, they must ask for that which we have reason to believe that God wills.

In the matter of praying for the repentance of Germany there can be no question as to our correspondence with the will of God.

From such prayer there follows a filial communion with Him Whom we call Father, we come to know Him, we are one with Him, we see as He sees, we love as He loves and being part-takers of the Mind of Christ hatred of any man becomes as impossible to us as it was to Him.

So by our prayer we are delivered from our own difficulties and have courage to go on waiting and praying, and hopelessness passes away.

We pray in the fullness of the life of God, and in the fullness of that same life we come to love our enemies even while the battle rages and their repentance and sorrow seem very far off.

That it may please Thee to forgive our enemies . . . and to turn their hearts;

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.—Bishop E. W. Osborne, in American Church Monthly.

Disobedience robs the soul of the sweet sense of Christ's indwelling.
Nothing can compensate for our failure to obey. Whatever our protestations, there is no real love to Christ where His commands are knowingly disregarded and set at nought. But each time we step out in simple obedience to His will, the inner light will shine deeper down into the hidden places of our being, and the reign and residence of Christ will be extended to new chambers of the heart.—F. B.

Meyer.

Everything we do will be great when it is what God wants done.—Ex.

"... The six copies of 'The American Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing . . . and the remainder will be distributed to staff officers. . . .

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover. . . . Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc." . . .

AGAIN, A LOAN FOR LIBERTY.

A very plain and emphatic duty presents itself once more to all our people. The Government, in full confidence of their willing response, is calling upon them to subscribe to a war loan of unprecedented magnitude. To absorb the Fourth Liberty Loan of six billions of dollars is an undertaking that must engage the co-operation, not only of great corporations and wealthy captains of industry, but of every wage-earner, every small investor, every man and woman who from the most meagre income can glean in three or four months enough savings to purchase a bond of the smaller denominations. The appeal is imperative to all whose heart is in the splendid purpose of the country to bring this war for liberty and righteousness to a certain, speedy and victorious end. The response en masse will gauge once more the unity, the sincerity and the determination of the American people in the greatest cause, the holiest crusade, ever engaged in by any nation.

The great need of the moment is to get convictions like these into the minds of our whole citizenship of every degree. It is not to stir up patriotism, we have that. It is not to justify our cause, for it has justified itself to every honest mind; or to apprehend the greatness of expenditure necessary, for it surpasses our imagination. It is to induce the realization on the part of each individual of his or her share and lot in the common undertaking, so that no one can feel exonerated at the bar of his own sense of duty who has done less than his best in the matter of lending to the Government for a season the purchasing power of his surplus means after his own carefully scrutinized necessities have been supplied.

The act itself will not be without its educational and disciplinary value. If it costs some temporary self-denial, some forethought and curbing of legitimate expenditures, so much the better. We are engaged as a people in a great enterprise from which we expect lasting results and, not least, intense joy and satisfaction when it is victoriously concluded. In this adventure some are giving their lives, some intense suffering and perhaps the mutilation of their bodies and a maimed future, some several years of their young manhood in exposure to danger and extreme labor and discomfort, some bereaved and bleeding hearts which will go unhealed for long and heavy years, some anxiety and longing for absent ones which, however bravely borne, becomes a haunting, numbing pain; and some are giving—nothing, in comparison with all this. A great deal of genuine interest and enthusiasm no doubt and a little enforced inconvenience, but nothing that costs. And there danger lies for these lest they miss the elements which in these days go to the upbuilding of character and the development of courage and fortitude and faith; lest they celebrate and claim participation in a victory cheaply and meanly won on their part and so fail of its glory and spiritual awards. In the day that victory shall crown the arms of those who have fought, and shed its halo around those who gave their noblest and best, they, and only they, who have with equal willingness of sacrifice done what they could in their humbler place can receive its full benefaction. But who would willingly miss it?

Again and again the opportunity of doing their little, and then their little more, is being offered to all the people of our land. It is not without their higher spiritual meaning that they come, nor without a recompense that they shall be dutifully and conscientiously met.

The Church War Cross, the design for which has been adopted by the Church War Commission and approved by Bishops Perry and Brent together with the latter's aids, Chaplains Moody and Doherty, is a medal one inch in diameter with a Greek cross embossed thereon bearing the legend, "Christ died for thee," with four smaller crosses between the arms. On the back appear the words, "The Church War Cross." It is meant to be worn around the neck. Ten thousand of these crosses are being sent at once to Paris. At present no distributions are being made on this side. They will be placed in the hands of the chaplains to be given to all soldiers who may desire them without regard to denominational distinctions.

Book Notices

(All books reviewed at any time in this column may be ordered at the publisher's price given, plus postage 15 cents, from the book department of the Southern Churchman.)

Religion in War-Time. Four Lectures by the Right Rev. Philip Mercer Rhinelander, Bishop of Pennsylvania. 1918. To be had from the Educational Department, Church House, Philadelphia. Pp. 80. Paper. 25 cents.

Beginning with the preface of these lectures, we wish to express our dissent to what seems to us a far too sweeping reflection upon the clergy. The Bishop refers with approval to the widely advertised charges of moral weakness and failure brought against the Christian ministry of our country in the article in the Atlantic Monthly, of Boston, in its number for last February, entitled "Peter Sat By the Fire Warming Himself," and asserts that "in the main the charge is true. . . . The guiding and informing of the nation's conscience, the bracing of the nation's will, has been done by others than the ordained ministers and messengers of God. They have been largely silent; or, if not silent, weak and faltering, which is perhaps worse"; and more to the same effect.

We do not know how broadly Bishop Rhinelander intended these assertions to be taken. They are made in very general terms. But it will naturally be inferred that he has primarily in mind the clergy of his own Church. His opportunity for judging may have been more extended than our own; but speaking for our clergy in the section of the country with which we are somewhat familiar, we believe that the intimations made are unjust and by no means in agreement with the facts.

The war broke upon the world suddenly. It found our clergy, in common with the rest of our citizenship, busy about the things that make for peace and but little versed in European politics or German philosophy. As the situation unfolded itself they were neither slow in grasping its significance nor faltering in the expression of their convictions. They have not hesitated to speak with the utmost boldness and with views singularly clear to the moral and spiritual issues involved. As never before, perhaps, our clergy have been moulders of opinion and leaders in action in their communities. And the same is true, in the main if not as universally, of the ministers of other churches around us. The facts have been recognized, not only by the people in general who have looked with deserved confidence to the Church for instruction and leadership, but by the Government, which has been quick to recognize the loyalty and power of the pulpit and to invoke its aid in every step it has taken in the progress of the war. We are bold to assert that Christian prophecy has not been "voiceless" in these times, but has spoken clearly and with no uncertain sound.

We are the more concerned that there be no mistaken impressions created in this regard because we understand that these lectures have been suggested by the Educational Department of the Board of Missions as collateral reading in connection with the "Advent Call." They are admirably adapted to the purpose, presenting the Christian conception of war, and especially of this war, in a striking and convincing way. The Bishop dwells on basic truths which have been too much overlooked and which today need to be sanely recognized lest we fall into intellectual and moral confusion. This booklet contains excellent reading for the clergy and will furnish seed thoughts for many sermons. We hope the good Bishop will omit or rewrite his preface and that this little book will have the wide circulation and influence that it deserves throughout the whole country.

For God and Country; or The Christian Pulpit in War-Time. Addresses by Rev. Randolph H. McKim, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., Rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., Pro Deo, Pro Civitate, Pro Hominum Salute. E. P. Dutton & Co. New York. Pp. 135.

Dr. McKim, at least, stands exonerated from the charge of being a voiceless prophet in war-time, yea, and before the war; for all but two of the sermons and addresses which are gathered in this attractive volume were delivered before we entered the war. Sooner than most the militant rector of the Epiphany saw the logical outcome of the events of 1915-16 if the country was to be true to its traditions and its Christian principles, and he did not conceal his impatience with what seemed to him the undue patience and delay of the Government. The outcome has justified both the preacher and the President. These eloquent and virile addresses well represented the crystalizing convictions of the best thought of the country at their various dates, and it is well that they should have been put into permanent form as a record of the sentiments of its Christian leaders. The closing sermon, delivered on last Thanksgiving Day, expressed the thankfulness of many a brave and suffering heart when we were at last irrevocably committed to a righteous and necessary cause.

Here and There

When the Serbs had passed the Krnyovo - Strigovo - Drogojel - Poloshko line, no doubt the Bulgars made up their minds to negotiate peace. They probably realized that if the entente troops could get past the line with a name like that it would be useless to try to stop them before they reached Sofia.

In Cleveland, O., the Cleveland Railway Company has decided to discontinue women conductors on their street cars after November 1st. The women, however, have appealed to the Secretary of Labor to try to hold their positions. The reason given for their discontinuance was that there was not sufficient shortage of men to make it necessary to employ women for this work. The Secretary of Labor will have to decide the matter, and no doubt it is the first of a good many such cases which will come before him as the war comes to a close, because the women will not want to relinquish the well-paid positions they have been occupying.

Recent events have induced Field Marshal Hindenburg to adopt the "skip-stop" system for the German Army. It is confidently expected that Marshal Foch will see to it that there is a good deal more skip than stop about his movements from now until the first of November any way.

Ten cargo ships carrying 500,000 barrels of gasoline have sailed for France, as the direct result of the gasless Sundays, according to a statement issued by Mark L. Requa, director of the oil division of the United States Fuel Administration.

It is reported that the Government has sent a letter of inquiry to the church building commissions of various religious bodies, asking information concerning erection of new churches, new parsonages and parish houses, and suggesting that new churches, if built at this time, be those that will serve whole communities and not congregations only. Erection of school buildings has been prohibited as a war measure in some cities, and church authorities are expecting to receive orders to end all church building.

Inquiries made of Congregational and Presbyterian building commissions bring the information that far fewer churches have been built within the past year, and that new ventures are officially discouraged. This does not apply to churches erected in war communities and at cantonments or near them, but to rural districts and city communities. On the other hand, the Episcopal commission reports greater building activity during the last six months than for many years.

Before the war American people put annually into new churches, parsonages and parish houses from $45,000,000 to $65,000,000 a year. During the years 1915 and 1916 the American investment fell to $30,000,000 and then to $20,000,000, and is now reduced to $10,000,000, and perhaps below. There are no very reliable figures obtainable, but these are estimates of persons who ought to be well informed.

Renewed appeals are going out from various denominations to their laymen to fit themselves as substitute preachers. The President of the United Brethren Seminary has just issued a call to ministers of his religious body to quit preaching sermons on unrelated topics, turn teachers instead, enroll their educated men into classes, and instruct them in the task of spiritual oversight for the period of the war. Heads of other seminaries are endorsing this appeal and its recommendations.

The fact of the depletion of the ministerial supply by the war, and the influx of new men in colleges and seminaries being almost wholly wiped out, the appeal to laymen is held to be mandatory. In England there have been liberal responses to similar appeals, but here as yet the response has been very small.

The Rev. Dr. Francis L. Patton, the veteran Presbyterian theologian, is anxious that the large use of laymen in church pulpits, as war measure, and because ministers are not to be had, shall not become a permanent policy of the churches. He warns that public opinion easily adapts itself to new conditions, and readily makes them permanent if no apparent reason to the contrary obtains. He is jealous of the function of the ministry, and does not want churches to believe that any men, no matter how able, may take their places. He says Presbyterian seminaries will be very hard hit in their enrollments this September.

The worth-whileness of a practical interest and aid on the part of the Southern white people for their colored neighbors, especially in rural districts, is illustrated by these facts coming from Sumter County, S. C.

Sumter County's increasing prosperity began with the determination of the county Council of Defense, as a war measure, to make efficient producers and conservers of the whole population, black as well as white. Leading white men, all last year, helped colored preachers and teachers to educate the mass of negro farmers. This resulted in bumper crops, a big clearance of mortgages on negro farms, and hundreds of new bank accounts opened by negroes, who also bought Liberty Bonds freely, and gave generously to war philanthropies. This year the same policy has been intensively pursued. In every township white and colored speakers have given the negroes practical instruction and advice, which they have followed. Their bank deposits have greatly increased. One man, though only a small farmer, put $800 into Liberty Bonds; and negroes in the county took over $114,000 worth of Thrift Stamps. They are getting better homes, churches and schools; sanitation is greatly improved; and they are grading up in every way. Prohibition, and the co-operation which has grown up between the best elements of both races through war needs, are jointly responsible for the change.

The United States Food Administration, speaking through our old mentor, Mr. Hoover, outlines the food conservation program for the coming year. The point is emphasized that to win the war next summer, and so save millions of lives, both the Allied armies and the Allied civil population must have ample food supplies. The Allies are using their shipping to transport our men and army supplies across, so cannot spare them to transport food-stuffs from more distant parts of the world and must rely upon us more largely than ever. Mr. Hoover gives the figures indicating what we must supply, but to most of us they would be nothing but figures. Here, however, is what we can understand.

If we survey our ability to meet this definite promise to them we find that while our wheat production this year is better than last year, our production of other cereals is less. We have had severe losses through drought in many sections. On balance our resources are no greater than last year. We find, however, that we can give this increase in food supplies, of 5,730,000 tons over last year, and still have a margin over the amount necessary to maintain our own health and strength.

At best the Allied table will be less than ours, for the Allied peoples are denying themselves more in order to transport our soldiers. We can do no less than fill the ships they send us.

Of our imports, we shall apparently have sufficient sugar to maintain the present consumption and take care of the extra drain of the Allies from our markets, instead of compelling them to send their ships to the Far East. We can secure in sailing vessels the coffee we need, if no one makes an over-brew. Of our own products we must secure a reduction in consumption and waste in the two great groups of, first, breadstuffs; and second, meats and fats; that is, in all bread and cereals, beef, pork, poultry, dairy and vegetable-oil products. The average consumption of our people of breadstuffs amounts to about six pounds per week and of meats and fats to four pounds a week for each person. A reduction in consumption of less than one-half pound per week per person in each of these two great groups of foods would accomplish our purpose. We wish to emphasize, however, that we do not want curtailment in the use of milk for children.

Some of our homes by reason of limited income cannot now provide more food than they should have to maintain health in the family. They cannot rightfully be asked to make the suggested reduction in consumption. But the great majority of our homes can do more than suggested.

We need even greater simplicity of living than last year amongst all that section of the community to whom foodstuffs are a secondary item in expenditure.

It is necessary that every family in the United States study its food budget and food ways to see if it cannot buy less, serve less, return nothing to the kitchen and practice the gospel of the clean plate.

The Soldier's Friend.

A Y secretary was calling on a group of officers on a matter of business connected with his department. An officer volunteered this interesting bit of information. "You Y men do not know the value of your work in this Army camp. You are keeping many men from the suicide route. You are furnishing them acceptable entertainment as well as religious service. You provide buildings for their use—equipped with good reading, music and stationery. You encourage them to write home. In fact, you are the link that ties them to the things at home. If the Y. M. C. A. should withdraw from the Army camp it would soon reveal how much your work means to these men. You are doing work really worth while. You are the soldier's friend."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

A SUGGESTION TO THE C. P. F.

Mr. Editor: As there has been much discussion of the Pension System, and as nearly $4,000,000 more than necessary was contributed for accrued liabilities, I wonder why this surplus could not be invested (since investment is the Church's policy) for the benefit of the aged and disabled clergy not benefited otherwise from the pension funds. Perhaps that would give them $30 a month.

Could this be called an open letter to the Pension Trustees?

BISHOPS OF INDIA ON UNITY.

Mr. Editor: I think it might help to stir up our Bishops and the Church generally to a more lively interest in the World Conference and the paramount need and importance of prayer, especially of prayer in common with our brethren, to see the enclosed resolutions of the Episcopal Synod of India passed last February.

ROBERT H. GARDINER.

Gardiner, Me., Sept. 26, 1918.

Resolutions Passed by the Episcopal Synod in Calcutta, February, 1918.

Resolved: That the time has come for Churchmen in this Province to take more active steps in preparing for the World Conference on Faith and Order and that for this purpose the Synod recommends:

That each Bishop should institute in his Diocese a committee of persons who should receive the literature of the World Conference Committee, and should be responsible for interesting the Church in the movement.

That whenever there is any considerable number of thoughtful men and women, members of various denominations who could be interested in matters connected with the unity of Christendom, the Synod suggests that Round Table groups should be formed for periodical conferences and discussions on the nature of the distinctive tenets of separated churches, and on the subject of Unity.

The Synod commends to the Bishops and the committees which they may form, the value of services of common prayer, in which those who have the cause of unity at heart may join, and adds the suggestion that they might be more profitable if they consisted mainly of silent prayer.

Christ is the only one whom not having seen we love.—Ex.

"When a man is content with himself he has met his second death."

Love is life, and they who do not love are not alive. But every soul that loves, lives in the heart of God and hears Him speak.—H. Van Dyke.

CAMP LIBRARIES.

He was a young Italian, a soldier in the American Army. He had been wounded, but now he was well enough to help in the domestic work of the big base hospital not far from New York City. There is a free public library in the hospital, one of the many libraries established in army and navy camps, transports and hospitals by the American Library Association. Every minute of his time when he is not working the young Italian soldier spends in reading the hospital librarian reports. He has read many volumes of the classics, from Dante's Inferno to Plutarch's Lives and Plato's Dialogues.

In addition he has read three biographies of Napoleon, Froude's Caesar, Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome, Maeterlinck's Measure of the Hours, Hudson's Psychic Phenomena and Maeterlinck's Laws of Spiritual Life. These books give him something to think about while he is sweeping the long corridors of the hospital. "I sweep," he says proudly. "This is the United States Army."

At Camp Funston, Kan., there are an unusually large number of foreign-born soldiers, and the library is well supplied with foreign language literature. "We have books in French, German, Spanish, Modern Greek, Yiddish, Norwegian, Swedish, Polish, Roumanian, Russian and Bulgarian," reports the librarian in charge, "and they are all in constant circulation."

Some of these books are by native authors and others are translations from English, for it is desirable that our foreign-born soldiers become familiar with English and American books. The other day a Greek boy brought a book to the librarian's desk to be charged. The librarian, not being able to read Greek, asked the boy what the book was.

"Why, don't you know?" exclaimed the soldier. "It's Sherlock Holmes."

These translations are extremely useful to the soldiers who are trying to learn to read English. They will read a book in their own language and then tackle the same book in English. Knowing what the story is about makes it easier to read. Knowing this, the librarian at Camp Gordon, Ala., got several copies of Robinson Crusoe for use among the foreign-born soldiers who knew little English. Almost every one had read the immortal Crusoe in his native language, and it was a good book for them to make the basis of English study.

The greatest demand for foreign language books are from Poles, French, Spanish, Jewish, Russian and Italian soldiers. About the stiffest request the Library Association has had so far was for the Arabian Nights in the original Arabic. A professor in Columbia University was appealed to, and before long the homesick soldier from the far East got the precious book of stories his heart craved.

We have at least forty nationalities represented in our great American Army, and while we hope, when the army gets back to the United States, every man in it will be speaking English fluently, there is no desire to make him forget the language he learned at his mother's knee. Above all, there is no desire to wean him from his family or his neighbors. In all of the camp libraries, in this country at least, foreign language newspapers are provided.

At Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ill., there are many Syrians. One day a Syrian soldier timidly entered the camp library, not really expecting to find anything to interest him. To his delight he found a Syrian newspaper published in New York. He sat down and read it through, advertisements and all. The next day he came back with two more Syrians. The news spread through all the regiments, and now, the librarian says, there is a delegation of Syrians waiting every evening to read their newspaper, which is donated to the camp by the publishers.

From Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich., the librarian writes: "There are men here who read and speak half a dozen languages all better than they speak English. Some of the men are very lonely because of their isolation by language, and reading is a great solace to them. Some of them read a book every day or two. Many of them are working hard on easy language books in their effort to learn English."

The Library Association, which furnishes books and librarians for all Army and Navy camps in the United States and France, Italy, Switzerland, on all transports and naval vessels, and even in the prison camps of Germany and Austria, are as mindful of the foreign-born soldier as of the American. They want to give him his native language books, and they want to help him study English. The Y. M. C. A. has classes in English everywhere, and it is the privilege of the libraries to furnish text-books. When the men come home from the war they will be better fitted to take their places in the community as American citizens. They will have their earning capacity greatly increased, because they speak and write English, and because their education will be vastly improved.

Beginning November 11th all the welfare forces at work to help the Army and Navy, the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., Library War Service of the American Library Association, the Jewish Welfare Board, the National Catholic War Council, the Salvation Army and the War Camp Community Service, will begin a great drive for funds to meet the needs of the coming year. The great sum of 170,500,000 must be raised if our soldiers and sailors and marines are to have the comforts they need and so amply deserve. Everybody will be asked to give as much as he can afford, and everybody who has a man in training camp, in the trenches overseas, or on the warships, will help to the utmost of his power to make the drive a success.

People are not asked to give to this or that fund. All the money goes into the common welfare fund, and each organization listed will receive its quota. To the library fund is allowed $3,500,000. What that money will mean to all the soldiers and sailors, in health and spirits and added efficiency, no words can tell. Morale wins. The dollar given to keep the morale of the Army and Navy at a never-die pitch is the most patriotic dollar in the world.

A life that is not a radiantly joyful life is an incomplete and unsymmetrical life; it is lacking in one of the principal elements that go to make up the complete life; it is not a life after God's pattern. Even if our lives were given up wholly to serving God and our fellowmen with utter devotion and utter forgetfulness of self, if they were not joyful lives, they would dishonor God. Constant joy is the commanded duty, as well as the promised privilege of a child of God, a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. R. A. Torrey.

The Great Commission

Head Kindergartner Wanted for Kyoto. Letter From Bishop Tucker.

The kindergarten has taken a foremost place in our work in Japan in commending the Church and her message to the Japanese people. We cannot begin to supply the demand for kindergarten teachers by bringing young women from America. Even if it were possible to do this, it would not be a wise thing to do. It is perfectly practicable to train Japanese young women as kindergarten teachers. Numbers of them are eager to be trained. We have made all our plans to open a school. Just as we thought all arrangements were satisfactorily made, we find that the young American woman whom we had counted upon to take charge of the department will not be available. I wonder if it is possible for you, in the United States, where it is so easy to find trained helpers of all kinds, to imagine our dismay!

It is, however, very desirable that this plan should not be abandoned. We have in the first place erected a building for the purpose and a model kindergarten is already in operation. An even more important consideration is the demand for such work here in Kyoto. We have an opportunity to supply a real need, and in doing so we shall be able to bring the influence of Christianity to bear in directions that would otherwise be closed to us.

Is there any one among your readers who would be willing to consider such a post of usefulness as this, or who knows of any one who would consider it. She should be, of course, sufficiently proficient in the technical side of kindergarten work to take charge of a training class; also she should possess a certain amount of executive ability and the force of character which would enable her to command the respect of those who work with her, and to influence strongly the young women who are trained as teachers. Another important point is that the head of such a department should be genuinely interested in the religious side of the work.

Mr. John W. Wood, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, will supply all necessary additional information.

H. ST. GEORGE TUCKER,
Bishop of Kyoto.*

Alms and the Woman.

(The Church General Hospital, Wuchang, and Miss Helen Littell.)

Those who read or heard the descriptions of the old Wuchang Hospital where a New England farmer would not have been allowed to keep his cow if he wanted to sell his milk, will rejoice in the progress of the new building. Exclamation points are frequent in letters from China that describe it. "The new buildings are almost finished and are beautiful!" "Splendidly substantial! Trees in the yard! Green grass! Fresh air! Sunshine! No crowding! Cleanliness! and a playground!" The halls and stairways are broad enough to carry stretchers from ward to operating-room. Large windows on all sides mean that the wards are flooded with light and air. The tubercular ward on the top floor is open on two sides with a southern exposure. The operating-room is what it should be, with the light an operating-room should have. And at the centre of the building, where it should be, between the men's side and the women's side, is the chapel, simple but beautiful, reminding all who enter the front door of the purpose for which all medical missionary work is done.

But the fund is not yet completed. At the time when the building fund for St. Mary's School, Shanghai, was complete, the committee went upstairs in the Church Missions House to find in the cable code a word that would send out the good news to China. They searched through a long list of combinations with "fund," but the mission code had no such word as "fund complete!" Let us hope that one has since been added, for we shall soon need it. Only $43,000 is still to be raised, and what is that in days when we raise our funds of millions and even billions? If it were $43,000,000 it would be given in a week.

In ordinary times only $13,000 more would be needed. But the low rate of exchange in China has caused a difference of $30,000 between the amount originally estimated and the amount in Mexican dollars now used for the building. The house still needed for the foreign nurses will cost $65,000 and a doctor's house $5,000. To complete the house for Chinese nurses will take $2,500 more. The balance is needed for equipment.

When the fund is completed, and not until then, the Wuchang Hospital will gain a worker who is as much needed as equipment. Miss Helen Littell, who for two years has given untiringly all her time and thought for the raising of the fund, has volunteered to go out as the evangelistic or social service worker for the hospital. Bishop Roots earnestly desires her appointment for work that the doctors and nurses have not time to do. The doctors and nurses themselves write eagerly of her coming. But she will not desert her post in America while there is a dollar of the fund still to be raised.

Let us give the $43,000 and release a valuable worker. When the Church will give without waiting to hear a stirring appeal, then missionaries on furlough can use their precious six months for rest and study. If each man or woman will send today what he or she can give to complete the Wuchang Hospital, then Miss Littell can start at once for China. The sooner she goes the sooner she will be ready to follow up the work that doctors and nurses are already beginning to do in the new building. Let us send our gifts now to the Treasurer of the Board, Mr. George Gordon King, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City. And may it be the cheerful giving that is loved by the Lord.

St. Bernard for Japan.

Some students of Church history and missions might find it of interest to analyze the value for the Christians of the Oriental races of the lives of various saints of the Early Church. One Japanese pastor had clear views on the subject, as the following incident shows:

"Mr. Ikeda, whose health had broken down, devoted his time to a translation of 'St. Bernard and His Times,' believing that the book would be a message of inspiration to Japanese Christians. To a friend visiting him in his poor lodging he confided his difficulties in finding a publisher because of the size of the work. The friend suggested that St. Bernard was but little known and that a life of St. Francis of Assisi would be more acceptable to both publisher and public. Mr. Ikeda acknowledged the force of this view and said that he, too, revered St. Francis, "but," he said, "St. Francis stood for love alone—selfless, gentle, self-sacrificing love. There is great power in that, but it is not enough. There is evil in men's hearts and that evil must be fought against and subdued. Only so can men be saved. Not St. Francis, but St. Bernard, is the man who combines in himself both these principles, love and the aggressive fighting spirit, and so I thought it would perhaps serve Christ best if I introduced St. Bernard to the Japanese Church."—Record of Christian Work.

Church War Commission.

At a meeting of the War Commission of the Episcopal Church at Washington, D. C., on Wednesday, September 25th, the following were the items of principal interest to the chaplains and people in general:

Since the last meeting of the Commission an order has been issued by the War Department, dated July 24th, withdrawing the privileges of civilian chaplains and giving them three months' notice within which to settle their affairs and to withdraw from the camps.

It is uncertain as yet what kind of an interpretation will be put upon this order. Evidently the local commandant has a wide latitude of privilege in interpreting the order. In some camps the commandant has asked the civilian chaplains to prepare to withdraw; in other camps the commandant has placed the religious affairs of the camp in the hands of a divisional commissioned chaplain and has allowed him to associate with himself not only other commissioned chaplains, but civilian chaplains as well. In at least one case a commandant has asked a civilian chaplain to assume a particular kind of work and has informally assured him of his continuance in the camp. In other words, it is impossible to say at present just what final action will be taken by the War Department, but is safe to prophesy that its policy will be clearly understood within a comparatively short period, and that thereafter the War Commission may be able to pursue its work with full knowledge of the conditions.

The Executive Secretary has written to bishops, civilian chaplains and others vitally concerned in this matter, requesting them not to encourage further appointments of civilian chaplains pending the final interpretation of this order, but also asking that those at present at work should continue at their posts and should in the meantime seek to discover the feeling of the local commandant on this matter. The War Commission has also, through the Executive Secretary, assured civilian chaplains already at work that they will not suffer financially in consequence of any action on the part of the War Department.

In regard to the commissioned chaplains, it may be said that at present one commissioned chaplain is allowed for every twelve hundred men. There is as yet an insufficiency of commissioned chaplains to fill the need either in this country or abroad. Chaplains are, however, being appointed with greater haste than heretofore in order that the need may be met as quickly as possible.

The War Commission is giving each one of the commissioned chaplains overseas permission to draw on Bishop Perry for a sum not to exceed $100 a month, such sum to be used for the more effective despatch of his work among the soldiers.

Commissioned chaplains, both those who are students at the Army Chaplains' Training School and those who have not been ordered to that school, are given $100 apiece for their equipment. They are also allowed to borrow from the Commission any sum not exceeding $500 without interest for a period of eighteen months, with possibility of renewal. The loan is intended to enable our chaplains to begin their work in as thoroughly prepared a way as possible.

Commissioned chaplains stationed on this side are allowed by the Commission $50 a month for work among their men. The rule applies to chaplains in the navy as well as to those in the army. Civilian chaplains are given a like amount.

At present from fifteen to twenty chaplains of our Church are passing through each session of the Army Chaplains' Training School at Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville, Ky. The chances are that this number will be greatly increased within the next few weeks. The session of the school lasts about five weeks and covers the important branches of learning necessary to the official duty of the chaplain.

Chaplains of all three orders are equipped whenever possible with portable altars, Corona typewriters, service books, and with vestments when they are not already supplied.

Since the last meeting of the Commission the following organizations have affiliated themselves with the Commission: The Brotherhood of St. Andrew, the Church Periodical Club and the Girls' Friendly Society. Preliminaries to an affiliation are at present being considered by the Joint Social Service Commission, the Guild of St. Barnabas and the General Board of Religious Education.

The terms of affiliation are, in general, that the society in question shall permit the Chairman of the War Commission, or the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the War Commission, or any member of the Executive Committee whom either may appoint, to preside over the meeting of the committee of such organization which has in its charge the war work of the organization; and, furthermore, that the detailed plans of work, together with the nominations of secretaries for field work and the salaries of workers, as well as all financial questions concerned with war work of said society, be finally passed upon at a meeting of the Executive Committee of the War Commission.

Practically all of the chaplains of the Episcopal Church, recently graduated from the Army Chaplains' Training School, accepted the $100 offered by the Commission for equipment, and about twelve of them have, up to the present time, accepted the Commission's offer for a loan of some part of $500.

The following appointments were made:

The Rev. Charles L.V. Brine, Civilian Chaplain at Portsmouth Navy Yard.
The Rev. Arthur L. Seifer to succeed the Rev. Bruce V. Reddish at Camp Lee.

The Rev. John Wilkins, Civilian Chaplain at Great Lakes Training Station.

The Rev. Samuel Neal Kent, Civilian Chaplain at Newport under the direction of the Rhode Island Diocesan War Commission.

The following resignations were announced:

The Rev. Nathan Matthews, until recently Civilian Chaplain at Camp Sevier, S. C., who has accepted a call to Massachusetts.

The Rev. Henry O. Nash, until recently Civilian Chaplain at Camp Greene, who has received a commission as Army Chaplain.

The Rev. J. H. Webber-Thompson, until recently Civilian Chaplain at Camp Joseph E. Johnston, who has also received a commission in the Army.

The Rev. Dr. Milton, of Wilmington, N. C., was asked to make an examination of the opportunities for work in the vicinity of Fayetteville, N. C.

Reports were made in regard to possibilities for new Army work as well as for work in the newly constituted hospitals of the country.

A proposition was laid before the Commission for work among the churches in the immediate vicinity of the universities and colleges, which have recently been taken over by the Army. The Executive Committee will give this matter careful consideration.

In the opinion of the Commission it was thought unwise to proceed with any new projects for buildings within the limits of the camps, inasmuch as the Commission is still uncertain what interpretation the War Department will put upon the order withdrawing civilian chaplains from the camps.

A proposition was laid before the Commission to join with the other churches in a common drive for funds for the coming year. The proposition is of a twofold nature, first, that there should be a common drive for funds; second, that there should be a common drive and a common fund, each church receiving that portion of the fund which is called for by the relation of its budget to the entire amount. This matter was referred to the Executive Committee with power to act. Suffice it to say that there is a strong sentiment among the churches in general that they should make a common appeal to the Church public.

HENRY B. WASHBURN.

War-Time Commission of the Churches.

The General War-Time Commission of the Churches held its second annual meeting in Washington September 24th, under the chairmanship of Dr. Robert E. Speer. Many subjects of interest in regard to religious work in the Army and Navy were discussed and the addresses made were of a high order.

A topic which had excited much attention was the new order dispensing with the services of camp pastors: A committee had been appointed to see what, if anything, can be done to retain the services of voluntary workers on a satisfactory basis, under the direction of the chaplains. —Dr. F. B. Keppel, Third Assistant Secretary of War, made an address in which he assumed responsibility for the issuing of the order. He said the department welcomes the support of bodies like this, and of all bodies so organized, that they can bring to bear on the life of the soldiers the higher, more worth-while things. The Army recognizes that the work which the soldiers have to do is strengthened by the highest spirit of devotion which we can encourage and maintain. The whole matter would be simple were it not that we have an embarrassment of wealth. Not the least of the difficulties is in keeping the various agencies from getting into one another's way. The War Department cannot speak to any one of them as a whole. It is not attempting that; but there has to be some co-ordinating agency, and it has to lie in the War Department. This was necessary in order to free the existing agencies themselves. He has been told by men returned from France that the spirit in which the chaplains are taking up their work overseas is fine, beyond all praise. He gave some interesting sidelights, telling especially of a chaplain who was to be honored for bravery in action, together with a number of soldiers, but who did not appear, while all the soldiers did. When search was made, the chaplain was found in the front line trenches with his men—he had forgotten all about the medal. That was the kind of man we want for chaplains. We must get the best men. Then he added: "Don't worry about the War Department living within its regulations. Of course, we do not abrogate them, but we are big enough to ignore a rule if we see good to the service in it." This was greeted with great applause.

Chaplain Frazier, dean of the naval chaplains, made a ringing speech, saying at the start that if the Federal Council Committee on Chaplains had not been organized the difficulties would have been much greater. From twenty-four chaplains in the Navy he had seen the number grow to 185, picked men, not in place because of the political pull of old, but recommended by their denominations and scrutinized by the Federal Council's committee, after which he called the best from the lot. He didn't take them on papers (laughter). He said he would stack the men he had taken as naval chaplains against the best bunch of civilians or officers that could be found.

Major John T. Axton, chaplain in charge at one of the ports of embarkation, said that the General War-Time Commission had supplied what was needed, reaching out to the War Department on the one side and the churches on the other. He paid the highest tribute to the work of the camp pastors, who had helped the chaplains gain a wider perspective. He described the effect of an address at a camp when a camp pastor appealed to the boys to leave behind in America the things they would be ashamed to carry abroad under the Stars and Stripes. Of their own motion, led by a corporal, the great body of men agreed to cut out the profanity as well as the gambling. "Do you think we are going to eliminate these men?" he asked. "Oh, no, for there is provisions that men may be called into co-operation by the chaplains. Isn't that your order?" he asked, turning to Secretary Keppel, who smilingly bowed. This was a most skilful and tactful address, and left the camp pastor matter in unexpectedly good condition for adjustment, so that the good work need not be stopped, while under a senior chaplain it may be directed and controlled, and only one authority on religious work in the camp be in control.

A resolution was adopted urging upon all the churches a hearty support of the combined drive of the seven organizations engaged in work for the welfare of our soldiers and sailors at home and abroad, under the supervision of the Commission on Training Camp Activities.

Bishop Gore, of Oxford, and Dr. Guttery, Secretary Daniels and Dr. Fosdick made memorable addresses at the evening sessions.

A Message From Bishop Brent, Senior G. H. Q. Chaplain on the Staff of General Pershing, to the War-Time Commission of the Churches.

The opportunity of the chaplain in the American Expeditionary Forces is unprecedented in military history. The best manhood of America is his to guide, inspire and mould. It has been a common complaint in parochial life that men do not form a prominent element in the average congregation. No such complaint can be made in the A. E. F. Again, our soldiers are in a temper of mind to welcome greedily the truth of God from the hearts of true men. They are at the most receptive moment of their lives. They are quick to detect and spurn unreality and sham. They are in search of, and responsive to, what is real.

The religious tomorrow of America lies latent in the soldiers of today, and it is the responsibility of the chaplain to shape it so that the kingdom of God will enter into American life with power. Already there is springing up among the chaplains a sense of brotherhood resulting from personal fellowship. It does not mean the breaking down of personal convictions, but rather the giving of due respect to the honest convictions of others. Mutual understanding is the first step toward unity.

The chaplain comes with two commissions—that of the Church which provides him with power from on high, that from the nation which indicates his sphere of duty. He is simply a minister of God working in military conditions. He is always and everywhere the spiritual general of the Army and his insignia perpetually proclaim it.

If the chaplain of the A. E. F. works in the uplands of opportunity, he also works in a furnace of temptations and difficulties. The strain will be constant, and, in both front line and back areas, terrific. Facilities for movement will be restricted owing to the insufficient transportation of the Army. Problems of moral and spiritual character will thicken daily. Endurance will be tested to the limit. Only strong men reinforced by an almighty God can meet the demands of the emergency.

We, upon whom has fallen the responsibility of organizing and directing the religious leaders of the A. E. F., are wholly dependent on the churches of America for the character and the number of those who come to us. We beg of you to think only of one thing—the choicest manhood of our nation is in France or headed toward France under the domination of the spirit of self-sacrifice. The strongest and best men in the ministry are not too good to serve them. It would be a crime to send weaklings or incompetents to so sublime and so difficult a task. Give us your best and give them promptly.

(Signed) C. H. BRENT,
Senior G. H. Q. Chaplain.

Chaplains Commissioned.

A class of two hundred and forty-five were turned out at the Chaplains' Training School at Camp Taylor, near Louisville, Ky., last week and received their commissions as chaplains in the Army of the United States. Among them were the following clergymen of this Church, and the list is probably not quite complete:

The Rev. Messrs. John Gass, Mississippi; Churchill J. Gibson, Lexington, S. Va.; Conrad H. Goodwin, Leesburg, Va.; Maxwell Ganter, New York City; Willis Gerhart, St. Elmo, Tenn.; Raymond Cunningham, Redding Ridge, Conn.; J. M. Stoney, Clemson College, S. C.; C. W. Popham, Belleville, N. J.; S. T. Steele, Camp Meade, Md.; A. M. Smith, Los Angeles, Cal.; Malcolm S. Taylor, Berryville, Va.; P. N. McDonald, Morgantown, W. Va.; W. G. McDowell, Staunton, S. Va.; R. A. Kirchoffer, Worcester, Mass.; E. R. Laine, Jr., Springfield, Mass.; Jeremiah Ward, Laredo, Tex.

Among those assigned to duty overseas, and who will probably be leaving within a few weeks, are the Rev. Messrs. Gass, Gibson, Goodwin, Ganter, Cunningham, Stoney, Smith and Taylor.

It is said that probably six hundred more chaplains are needed for service now; and as the new draft is organized the demand will doubtless be continuous for some time.

The Late W. R. Stirling.

Whereas, since the last previous session of the Synod of the Mid-West, its Treasurer, William Robert Stirling, has passed into the realm of the Church at Rest,

Be it resolved, That we place on record our sense of gratitude to Almighty God for the example of his life as a Christian Churchman. Deeply interested as he always was in every movement for the advancement of the Kingdom of God, he stood ready to do what he could for the organization of the Synod. Deputized to represent the Diocese of Chicago at its first session, he became one of the Provincial representatives on the General Board of Missions, the Secretary of this body, and then its Treasurer. With marked preference in matters of ecclesiastical polity and practice, his breadth of sympathy, his willingness to yield, and his readiness to support generously, both by his influence and his financial contributions, every kind of effort that gave promise of efficiency in the work of the Master, brought to him the confidence, the gratitude and the love of his associates. Unsparring of his none too great physical strength, Mr. Stirling, while at the head of a large business, filled his daily calendar with affairs of the Church up to the day of his death. Particularly during the last decade of his life he was constantly alive to the fact that "the King's business requireth haste." He believed in and practiced the priesthood of the laity. He lived in constant and close communion with his Lord. Dying, he was consciously upheld by the Everlasting Arms. God grant to him abundant refreshment and joy in the activities of Paradise!

Be it resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to his family and to the Church papers, and be entered on the minutes.

Postponement of Synod of the Province of Sewanee.

Jacksonville, Fla., Sept. 18, 1918.

My Dear Brethren:

The exigencies of the war have made so many demands on the time of the clergy and laity, and have increased the expense of living and traveling to such an extent, that it has seemed wise to the Bishops of the Province of Sewanee with one exception, and to a large number of the delegates, to postpone the meeting of the Synod till the Tuesday after the second Sunday in November, 1920.

Acting under the authority given me in Section 5, Ordinance 1, I hereby postpone the meeting, appointed to be held in Louisville on the 12th of November next, till November 16, 1920. At the request of the Bishop of Kentucky, I appoint Louisville, Ky., the place in which the meeting shall be held.

Yours in Christ and His Holy Church,
EDWIN G. WEED,
President of the Synod.

Hospital Nurse Honored.

The Red Cross authorities, recognizing the need of maintaining St. Stephen's Hospital, Fort Yukon, Alaska, the only place where medical relief may be had on 700 miles of the Yukon River and in 50,000 square miles of the territory, have granted a "special service chevron" to Miss Beatrice Nunevillar, the one remaining graduate nurse at the institution.

The following cablegram from General Pershing has just been received by Dr. Robert E. Speer in response to a cablegram expressing the loyalty of the churches and the assurance of their confidence and hearty co-operation which was sent by the General War-Time Commission of the Churches at its meeting in Washington, D. C., on September 24th.

"Many thanks for your cable of confidence. We rely on the churches at home to keep the spirit of the people white hot with patriotism and courage until victory has been won."

(Signed) PERSHING.

The headquarters for Merchant Marine recruits is in East Boston close to St. John's Church. I shall be very glad to try to befriend Churchmen who have chosen this kind of service or members of their families who are visiting in East Boston.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Meeting of Woman's Auxillary.

The annual meeting of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxillary of Southern Virginia will be held in Christ Church, Roanoke, October 10 and 11, 1918, with an informal reception for the delegates and visitors on the evening of Wednesday, the 9th.

Dr. Harry Taylor, our own missionary, of St. James' Hospital, Anking, China, will be the speaker on Foreign Missions, and the Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, and the various mountain missionary workers, will tell of the work and its needs within our Diocese.

The Juniors will hold their meeting on Saturday, the 12th.

It is hoped that there will be a large attendance of delegates, and each branch is urged to have a representative present to discuss the plans for our work in the coming year.

Faithfully yours,

Loulie Taylor Letcher,
Diocesan President.

Red Cross Conference.

With the view of promoting a closer personal co-operation between the directors of the Potomac Division of the American Red Cross and the various chapters distributed throughout the three States, the fourth of a series of group conferences will be held at Roanoke, Va., on October 1st, 2d and 3d.

In order that the representatives of the chapters located in the sections covered by this conference may learn at first hand the scope of departmental work and the programs of the directors of the various bureaus for the coming year, an intensive study of the different forms of activity outlined will be made.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Death of the Rev. R. S. Carter.

The Rev. Robert Smith Carter, a valued and faithful clergyman of the Diocese, died suddenly in Charlottesville on Wednesday, September 25th, of heart trouble. Mr. Carter was a native of Albemarle County. After some years of business in the West he entered the Theological Seminary in Virginia, and was graduated and ordained deacon in 1891 and priest the following year. His first charge was in a large mission field in Southwest Virginia with its center at Big Stone Gap, where he did a fine work for four years. He was then rector of Grace Church, Hopkinsville, Ky., for six years, and from 1901 to 1908 was rector of Christ Church, Smithfield, Diocese of Southern Virginia. In the latter year he became rector of St. Thomas' Church, Orange, Va., and after ten years' service at that place retired on account of ill health on the first of June last. He was a man full of missionary zeal, and for a number of years has been a member of the Executive Committee of the Diocesan Missionary Society.

At the Missionary Conference at Silver Bay this July Virginia was well represented with twenty-three delegates, nineteen of whom were from Richmond. The days were strenuous, but it was not all work. There were classes in the morning, but the afternoons were usually given over to recreation of some sort, and then after supper there was a devotional service, at which, always, one or more good speakers were to be heard. This service was over about 9:15, and then many of the groups collected for prayers before retiring. The Virginia group formed a real "circle of prayer" as each night they gathered together on their cottage porch and each one offered a short prayer to the Almighty on some given subject.

It is a great inspiration to be at one at a conference at which practically all denominations are represented and all sections of the country united in their efforts to further missionary education. Courses of all kinds were offered, such as Methods in Conducting Mission Study Classes; Problems which confront the Social Worker in City and Country; Mission Study for Young People and Adults, etc. In many of these classes returned missionaries gave their personal experiences in the mission field, bringing out the problems in their work and making practical suggestions for the would-be missionary. All took part in the class discussions and in this way helped each other.

The conferer was smaller than in previous years on account of the war, and for that very reason every one felt that they must work the harder to take back to the outside world the ideas and inspiration gained so that others also might be benefited. Truly the motto for this conference was "For their sakes I consecrate myself."

St. Stephen's Parish, Northumberland County: On Tuesday noon, September 24th, the bells of old St. Stephen's, Heathsville, and St. Mary's, Fleton, were rung by order of the rector, the Rev. T. D. Harari, in honor of the capture of Nazareth of Galilee, the home of our Saviour, by the British. On Sunday, September 29th, being the feast of St. Michael and All Angels, a thanksgiving service was held after the morning service. The church was decorated with flowers and the pulpit draped with the American flag.

Convocations: The Valley Convocation will hold its one hundred and thirty-first semi-annual meeting at Wickliffe Church, Wickliffe the Rev. R. C. Cowling, rector, on October 15th-17th, inclusive.

The fall meeting of the Convocation of the Valley of the Rappahannock will be held in St. Anne's Parish, Essex County, the Rev. J. L. Showell, rector, on October 16th and 17th. All-day services will be held in St. Matthew's Church on the 16th and in Vawter's Church on the 17th.

The Piedmont Convocation will meet in Trinity Church, Washington, Bromfield Parish, Rappahannock County, October 14th-16th inclusive. Tuesday evening a Sunday school address on Teacher Training is expected from the Rev. S. U. Mitman, Ph. D.

The Church Club of Richmond was organized on Wednesday, September 25th, at a meeting held at the residence of Bishop Gibson. Mr. William Meade Addison was elected President and Mr. John M. Taylor and Dr. J. N. Upsaur Vice-Presidents.

The Rev. William B. Lee, rector of Abingdon and Ware Parishes, Gloucester County, is a patient at Grace Hospital, Richmond, Va.

Mrs. J. J. Sutton, 2217 Hanover Street, Richmond, who recently resigned her position as Custodian of the United Offering of the Woman's Auxillary, on account of ill health, has again taken up her duties. During her illness last year the work was carried on by Mrs. J. L. Antrim.

The Bishop requests that the clergy of the Diocese preach patriotic sermons.

with special reference to the Liberty Loan, on Sunday, October 6th.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

A beautiful service was held at Bowling Green, in Christ Church, on the seventeenth Sunday after Trinity, when a large service flag, recently presented to the church, was raised to supplement the smaller one, hanging inside the church near the chancel.

After a patriotic sermon by the rector, the Rev. Alexander Galt, the vested choir marched to the front lawn of the church, followed by boys of the Sunday school carrying flags of the Allies. After them came five little girls, dressed in white with red, white and blue ribbons, bearing the service flag.

After the congregation had assembled on the lawn, the roll of those who had given themselves to the service of the country was called, followed by a brief address by Colonel Malcolm H. Crump. During the singing of the hymn, "Our Father's God to Thee," the flag was raised.

The church is well represented in the nation's service, and the flag bears twenty-one stars and one red cross.

ASHEVILLE.

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

Mission Work in the Mountains.

The work in the Good Shepherd's, St. Mary's and St. George's Missions, near Morganton, in the mountains of Western North Carolina, has gone on beautifully this summer under the management of the Rev. Cortez Cody. The spirit of the Master's admonition, "It is more blessed to give than receive," has been exemplified by a 60 per cent. increase in the minister's salary, raised by the Good Shepherd Mission, and an 80 per cent. increase at St. Mary's. A mission was held at both places lasting a week, with a good attendance regularly.

Mr. Cody's brother-in-law, the Rev. Dr. Seagle, of St. Stephen's, New York City, assisted in the mission at the Good Shepherd and celebrated the Holy Communion. His very able sermon was appreciated by all. Nine children were baptized at St. Mary's.

Mr. Cody has returned to the Virginia Seminary to finish his course, and left Mr. Frank S. Drury, of Morganton, who was licensed as lay reader, to assist the Rev. B. L. Lassiter, of Marion, N. C., in the work, which is progressing nicely.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Rev. Francis H. Richey, of Asbury Park, has accepted the rectorship of St. George's Church, Vailsburg, to enter upon his duties about November 1st.

St. Paul's Church, Newark, has fitted up the second floor of its parish house with fifty beds for soldiers and sailors who may be in Newark on leave without a cheap, comfortable place to spend the night. The week-end accommodation is not sufficient and other churches will help out. A simple breakfast is provided. The work has been very satisfactory.

The Rev. Victor W. Mori, of Madison, has been appointed Archdeacon of Morristown, which includes the three western counties of the Diocese, in place of Archdeacon Tyler, who has become United States Chaplain in France. The Archdeaconry meetings are appointed as follows: Newark at Short Hills, October 24th; St. Luke's, Paterson, October 29th; Jersey City at Trinity, Hoboken, November 6th; Morristown at Madison, November 7th. Nearly all the clergy of the Diocese are brought together at these meetings for the discussion of living questions and the consideration of Diocesan affairs. In Paterson and Jersey City there is a good attendance of laymen in the evening.

Several building plans must be postponed because of the Government regulations. At Vailsburg, where a new church building was planned, it will probably be necessary to enlarge the parish house in an inexpensive way to meet the absolute need of the congregations, gathered under the Rev. R. W. Conklin.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Bishop Wakefield at Trinity Church.

Bishop Wakefield, of Birmingham, Eng., preaching in Trinity Church on the last Sunday in September, gave a list of things which England has learned by the war. The English people were not united concerning the war, perhaps up to the time of the death of Lord Kitchener. The religious bodies were of small account in bringing in unity. When at last the people were confronted with choice between right and wrong, truth and falsehood, then they rang true, and England was one.

England had not realized until the war was well along to the present that the nation as well as the individual has duty to perform. It never grasped the fact that the Divine must reside in the nation as such, and not merely in the Church and in its members. Four years ago there was much talk about slackers. Men did not feel insulted if called by it. Many even asked what England had done for them, that they ought to do anything for England? The war changed it all.

Women had a distinctly different place and part from men. Now because of war experiences women have their proper place, and they are proving worthy of it. Finally, according to the Bishop of Birmingham, the great thing is what we all will do after the war is over. He wanted the fact known that the France we now praise so highly, and do well in so doing, is not a France that existed long years past, and the rest of the world was ignorant of it, but a France that has been made by the war. There has been a tremendous change in the French character. The Bishop said he knew whereof he spoke, for he was educated in France.

The one thing the Bishop emphasized as the lesson to be learned and followed after the war is that of service. It will be well to have a League of Nations, but it will fail unless individuals serve others, people and nations, and brotherhood obtain.

The Cathedral was filled on the last Sunday afternoon in September by people interested in the war work of the Church. Bishop Greer returned from his vacation, and feeling stronger than for some time, arranged the meeting. The speakers were the President of the Federal Council of Churches, the Rev. Dr. Frank Mason North, a Methodist missionary secretary, and the Rev. Dr. William Adams Brown, head of the War-Time Commission of the Churches, who is a professor in Union Theological Seminary. Many patriotic songs were sung, the people joining.

Trinity Parish Unit of War Camp Community Service:

In conjunction with the War Camp Community Service, Dr. Manning is now arranging for Trinity Parish to give the use of several of its buildings to serve as quarters for soldiers and sailors, while staying in the city. The Trinity Church Parish building at 90 Trinity Place will be entirely turned over to this purpose. The Sunday school and other organizations being transferred temporarily to the vestry buildings in the rear of St. Paul's Churchyard. This work will be known as the Trinity Church Unit of the War Camp Community Service. The building will provide sleeping accommodations for a large number of men, also a canteen, gymnasium equipment, pool tables and other facilities. All soldiers and sailors will be welcome in accordance with the general plan of the work of the War Camp Community Service. On Twenty-fifth Street, in connection with Trinity Chapel, the parish school building and the old rectory at 27 West Twenty-fifth Street, are to be used in the same manner. This work will be known as the Trinity Chapel Unit of the War Camp Community Service. This work will be carried on under the direction of committees consisting of members of the two congregations in conjunction with representatives of the War Camp Community Service.

At the invitation of the Bishop of Montreal, the Rev. Dr. Manning will conduct the annual Quiet Day for the clergy of the Diocese of Montreal. The services will commence on the evening of October 29th and will close with a celebration of the Holy Eucharist on the morning of the 31st.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

A Triple Celebration: On Bishop Whitehead's seventy-sixth birthday, October 30th, he has invited the clergy and people of the Diocese to celebrate with him and Mrs. Whitehead their golden wedding and the Jubilee of the Bishop's Ordination to the Priesthood. Not that these events occurred on the same day, but both fifty years ago. As it is war times, the Bishop desires no extensive or expensive celebration, but he hopes to meet large numbers of the people of the Diocese at a brief service to be held at the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, and a reception to follow in the parish house. The Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., Bishop Suffragan of Pennsylvania, will preach the sermon. Bishop Garland is a native Pittsburgher, and he is the only person upon whom Bishop Whitehead has laid his hands in the conferring of the Three Orders of the Ministry; admitted Deacon, June 28, 1891; ordained Priest, January 12, 1892; consecrated Bishop, October 28, 1911.

The Committee of Arrangements consists of the Rev. Drs. Brown and Hills, the Rev. Messrs. Slayton and Richards, and Messrs. J. W. Paul, F. S. Blissell, D. B. Oliver, E. S. Craig, James E. Brown, Reade H. Bailey and George H. Danner.

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

A COMING CONFERENCE.

What promises to be a very interesting meeting has been called to assemble in Philadelphia on October 30th-31st.

The following letter has been sent out from the headquarters of the Philadelphia City Mission:

The undersigned being persuaded of the great advantages that may ensue from a conference of the superintending officers of the City Mission Societies of the Church, after informal discussion, extends you an invitation to meet in the offices and as the guests of the Philadelphia City Mission in Philadelphia October 30th and 31st next for purposes of discussion of the many problems of City Mission work and the possible organization of something in the nature of a City Mission Council.

It has been proposed that this first conference should be of the round table variety and without set addresses, and that our discussion shall be under the following group heads:

(a) Organization for fellowship, co-operation, legislation, education and so forth.

(b) Scope and method. Definition, comparison and suggestion.

(c) Problems, salaries, finance, relationships, supplies, literature, propaganda and so forth.

The terminology in different dioceses varies, but our intention is to include the superintending officers of organized Episcopal City Mission Societies in this first conference, but not to limit the invitation to a definite name. It is those responsible or intending responsibility for the City Mission class of work that we would reach. Please accept this invitation and signify promptly that you will do so. Please suggest anything, especially lines of discussion, questions to be answered. Please bring or forward in advance specimens of charts, literature, magazines and propaganda, also case face sheets, forms of recording and anything else that you like or dislike but are using and think may be helpful or a warning to others.

Our intention is to be very informal, hospitable, mutually useful and agreeable.

Very cordially yours,

The Conveners: Charles P. Tinker, D. D., New York City Mission; Ernest J. Dennen, Boston City Mission; William H. Jefferys, M. D., Philadelphia City Mission; H. Cresson McHenry, Philadelphia City Mission.

Such a conference as this is bound to be of tremendous advantage to all those who are fortunate enough to be able to attend.

One of the most effective methods of improving one's work is to find out how some one else is doing the same sort of work. Almost every man has some line in which he excels, and such a conference as the one suggested offers excellent opportunities for men with open minds and progressive ideas both to impart and acquire information that will be of the greatest value in work of this nature. It is very much to be desired that this initial conference will be largely and enthusiastically attended so it may lead to a strong permanent organization.

A SOUTHERN CITY MEETING ITS RESPONSIBILITY.

Probably there is no place in the world which has profited more largely and permanently by the activities brought about by the present war than has Norfolk, Va.

It is gratifying to find that this municipality has realized the duty that it owes to the thousands of new people who have come to make their homes within its limits.

On September 1st a new charter which had been adopted a short time ago went into effect. Under it the office of Mayor has been abolished, and also the old City Council. Their places are taken by a board of five men who receive a salary and whose duty it is to employ a "city manager." This board at once secured an experienced man who had been trained in this line of work in the State of Ohio, thereby showing their intention to ignore politics and seek a thoroughly efficient man, even though it was necessary to go outside their own locality and Commonwealth to find one.

The governing of a modern city is a purely business matter and should be treated as such, and the personal equation should be eliminated, the only thing to be considered is results.

ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE AMERICAN PRISONERS' ASSOCIATION.

This organization is called to meet in its annual session on October 14th to 18th in New York City. The objects of the Association, we are told, are:

1. The improvement of the laws in relation to public offenses and offenders, and the modes of procedure by which such laws are enforced.

2. The study of the causes of crime, the nature of offenders and their social surroundings, the best methods of dealing with offenders and of preventing crime.

3. The improvement of the penal, correctional and reformatory institutions throughout the country, and of the government, management and discipline thereof, including the appointments of boards of trustees and of other officers.

4. The care of, and providing suitable and remunerative employment for discharged prisoners, and especially such as may have given evidence of reformation.

No line of work is more essentially Christian than the reforming of wrecked and broken characters where such reformation is possible, and no line of work is more important to our communities than the safe-keeping of the hopelessly incorrigible. It is therefore hoped that clergymen and social workers will try to follow the proceedings of this Congress and occasionally bring their importance before their congregations by means of sermons and addresses.

BETTER SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

At this time, when so many of our Church leaders are being called into the active service of their country in such varied and irresistible ways, it is more than ever important that churches all over the country should take an especial interest in the training of Sunday school teachers.

The two great conferences at Silver Bay, N. Y., and Black Mountain, N. C., are of course of the utmost importance and benefit in this line.

But they should be what the officers' training camp is to the Army, and those who are fortunate enough to attend them should realize the responsibility of passing on the good things they have received to others less fortunate.

Another excellent method which is being adopted in numerous places is that of interdenominational teacher training courses. Such subjects as the Life of Christ, St. Paul's Missionary Journeys, Old Testament History and the lives and characters of Bible heroes can be made the basis for instruction in such meetings.

The Episcopal Church has in the past been far too indifferent to the efficiency of its Sunday school teachers, and the time has now arrived when this fact should be looked fairly in the face and remedied in every way possible.

The Only Way.

Oh, the roads men make and the ways they take

To lead them up to Heaven,
Since the first-made man, with his easy plan,

From Eden's gate was driven!

Some turn and twist through fog and mist

With a plea of the Father's kindness;
Some only lead to a newer creed
For the cure of mortal blindness;

Some waver out in the sands of doubt
Where the trail is lost forever;
And some sink into the swamps of sin
And cease their high endeavor;

Some stop before the open door
Of a Higher Critics' college;
And some stretch on in the twilight wan
Of Scientific Knowledge;

Some lose the way in the miry clay
Of the Devil's specious treason;
Some wander lone in the vast unknown
Of philosophic reason;

But never a way will reach the goal
Save the Way that God has given.
For "the blood-red road of the Cross of Christ"

Is the only road to Heaven.

Collect for Nineteenth Sunday After Trinity.

O God, forasmuch as without Thee we are not able to please Thee; Mercifully grant that Thy Holy Spirit may in all things direct and rule our hearts; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Character of God is Fundamental to Prayer.

When we come to God, we must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of all those who diligently seek Him. A belief in the verity and integrity of God is essential to true prayer.

God is—that is a fixed fact, an undeniable postulate, which gives to prayer a remarkable advantage and a foundation upon which to base petitions. He exists for a purpose, and that purpose is beneficent and banevolent. God is, and that inspires confidence and produces a spirit of restfulness and of hope. God is, and, therefore, many other things are that without Him could not be—for instance, man, creating truth, righteousness, mercy, forgiveness and love. God is; He is the beginning, no, the unbeginning of all things. He is the first and the last, the all and in all, for without Him there could not be anything. He is, hence there is life in multifarious forms—these are fundamental principles and axiomatic facts. He is, that furnishes the key to the interpretation of all things.

That He is a rewarder of all who diligently seek Him gives a marvelous scope to all legitimate requests, and a marvelous prayer grip upon Divine resources. That declaration puts unbelief to rout, clips the wings of doubt, puts boldness into faith, courage, inspiration and determination into the heart of the petitioner, and furnishes a wonderful leverage with which to conquer the world for Christ. That promise supersedes and really supplants all attempts at scientific tests of answered prayers. It is the Divine certification of a prayer fact, that God pledges Himself to hear and answer all true prayer. It is no longer a matter of Divine possibility, but of Divine veracity and of the individual's compliance with the condition embodied in the promise, "All who diligently seek Him." That promise is inclusive and exclusive. It throws the door of opportunity back on its hinges, and invites all men to enter and be at rest.—The Evangelical Messenger.

Rest in Labor.

The deepest rest and the highest activity coincide. They do so in God who worketh hitherto in undisturbed tranquility; they may do so in us. The wheat that goes round in swiftest rotation seems to be standing still. Work at its intensest, which is pleasurable work, and level to the capacity of the doer is the truest form of rest.—A. Maclaren.

Nineteenth Sunday After Trinity: On Monday last began the week-day use of the Maccabean books from the Apocrypha, and we have also introduced Sunday lessons from the same source, beginning with the nineteenth Sunday after Trinity. The Prayer Book lectionary uses the Apocryphal books sparingly and omits the Maccabean histories altogether, although they are mentioned in Article VI among the books to be read "for example of life and instruction of manners," though not "to establish any doctrine." On the other hand, we are glad to find ourselves in accord with the Canterbury Revision in the use of I and II Maccabees both on Sundays and week days. The vindication of this course must be sought in the impression made upon the mind by the history itself. But it may well be argued, as has already been suggested, that we cannot understand the conditions which faced our Lord in His earthly ministry without knowing the Apocrypha; that is, the literature that fills the gap between the Old Testament and the New; and if we are to use the other Apocryphal books, there is certainly no good reason for excluding the historical ones. Neither does there appear any good reason for refusing to read on a Sunday what we consider good enough to use on other days of the week. Certainly it will be conceded that many chapters of I and II Maccabees make highly interesting reading just at this time! If there is any period of history or any human experience that furnishes so good a parallel with the present infamous attempt on the part of one nation to force its tyrannical government and its "kultur" upon another people, as the times of the persecution of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, it is not known to the writer. It is the story, for example, of Belgium written in advance; nor could any words more fittingly sum up the attitude of the Allies today than those with which Judas Maccabeus concluded one of his addresses (1 Mac. 3:58-60). From the standpoint of the Evolution of national ethics, these Maccabean wars (on Israel's side) may be said to fit in between wars of conquest, like those by which Israel got possession of the Land of Canaan, and that highest stage in which the Church is, —the story of the Christian Church out of the ruin of the old. This chapter from Romans also connects with the thought of the Collect (Epistle also) that the Holy Spirit may in all things direct and rule our hearts. The evening lessons were selected specifically for that idea, Ezekiel prophesying the one heart and new spirit, and John 14 giving our Lord's promise of the gift of the Spirit. The new material introduced on week days is the Epistle to the Philippians, an exposition of spiritual religion and showing that in order to receive the Spirit, we must seek, not the righteousness of the law, the mere repression of the fleshly nature through legalism, but complete fellowship with the Crucified, Risen and Glorified Redeemer.

Note: Our Lord wished to avoid being misunderstood in His true position. The little child represents an unquestioning faith, and active obedience. Christ carefully says acceptable service has this motive—"in His Name." Christ tries to make His hearers realize for how much they need forgiveness of God; so the offences for which they must forgive others will appear in due proportions. In the Sermon on the Mount He also shows what here He takes for granted, that we can expect to be forgiven only as we and how we forgive.

"British Cavalry Enters Nazareth."
 —Press Dispatch.

Nancy Byrd Turner.

To-day the wires bring strange word;
 We hear it told with wondering breath;
 A clamor from afar is heard—
The armies enter Nazareth.
 The little town where Christ was young!
 The village where Himself hath been!
 With holden spur and reverent rein
 The horsemen enter in.

There where the riders wheel and turn
 Into some climbing, crooked street,
 Surely (we dream) they might discern
 The imprint of His boyish feet,
 And where an old tree thrusts its roots
 Long withered, into ancient soil,
 Might see a grave young carpenter
 Bent low above his toil.

The little, meek, ungainly town,
 So barren and so bare of grace!
 Men used to say with scornful frown,
 "Can good come out of such a place?"
 Yet even as they spake there trod
 One in their midst (the prophet saith)
 Whose shoes they might not touch—and God
 Came out of Nazareth.

O Nazareth of Galilee,
 A thousand and a thousand years,
 And still the war-sick world of Thee
 May learn, amid its doubts and fears—
 That good can flower 'out of ill,
 That peace is worth the price of pain,
 That life and love and sacrifice
 Shall not be spent in vain.

That little city 'mid the hills
 From whence the Conqueror did come!
 To-day it sends a word that thrills
 The very heart of Christendom;
 A bugle blows from height to height,
 Across the fields of dust and death,
 And slow the armies of the Right
 Ride into Nazareth.

Mother Silver's Spectacles.

When Mrs. Silver stopped one day to think about herself, she found that she was past the age at which most people begin to wear glasses. Her husband had put them on long before. It was a wonder she had not realized sooner how much she needed them. A few evenings later she beamed upon her family at dinner-time through a brand-new pair of spectacles. "Now, this is like living!" she exclaimed. "To think that there's a beautiful pattern in the parlor wall paper, and I never knew it till today! Do you hear, father? That paper's been on the wall three years, and I thought 'twas a plain, tan color. And what's this? A new tablecloth?"

Everybody that was looking at her as she sat down protested. "You know when we got this tablecloth and all about it."

"I never saw that rosebud design till this minute," Mrs. Silver declared. "It's lovely, too. Why, I feel as if I had a lot of splendid new things."

Just then something called her from the table; and while she was gone her husband said musingly: "Your mother is just the opposite from my Aunt Cornelia when she first put on glasses.

Uncle Robin brought 'em home from town one day—he thought maybe she was beginning to need them—and the first thing she did after she got 'em on was to take one of the children by the shoulders and say: 'Mercy! I didn't know you had freckles.'

"But that's just like mother, not the opposite," small Tim demurred.

"No; the difference is that my Aunt Cornelia discovered freckles and dust in corners and grease spots and everything bad until life wasn't worth living to the rest of the family."

"I never thought of that," said the grown-up daughter. "Mother must be discovering unpleasant things, too. She hasn't spoken of one; but if her eyesight has been affected ever since we put that paper on the parlor, just think!"

"Just think!" Her father took up the words playfully. "Think of the lines and changes in my face alone that she hasn't known were there! But you won't catch her speaking of them. That isn't your mother's way."

"Let's make her tell if father's face does look any different to her," some one proposed, just as Mrs. Silver, quite unconscious that she was the subject of discussion, came back to the table.

Everybody was looking at her as she sat down and met her husband's eyes. Suddenly she leaned a little forward and studied his face intently with an expression that was tender, loving, all in one.

"Caught!" said one of the boys under his breath. "What have you just found out about father's face, Mamsie? Tell us."

"H'm! What's that?" Mrs. Silver temporized, looking actually guilty.

"Go ahead and tell 'em, mother," Mr. Silver said.

"Mind!" There was a volume in the one word as she spoke. Then she took off the wonderful glasses and wiped a little dew from them before she answered, glancing round the circle, "You don't know, children, what it means to me to see your father's smile again across the table as plain as ever. I was thinking, when I looked at him, how many of 'em I'd missed."—Youth's Companion.

A Changed Plan.

Alice Maude Ewell.

Miss Angelica Bland is one of our few last surviving examples of gentle blood and simple living. There used to be many of these modest householders in Virginia. Now they are rare, and growing rarer. It is pleasant to meet her like now and then. She is (I take pleasure in putting her still in the present tense) a small, slim, shrinking body in her early sixties. She has blue eyes and a sweet vague smile. She is in a way childish, but not silly. She is the soul of loyalty, having more beliefs than opinions. She has, or had till very lately, one enthusiasm.

It was developed late in life. In her struggling cramped youth—just after the War Between the States—Miss Angelica did not have time to think much about her brother who had been slain in battle. Her memories of him, except for certain boyish pranks which had left an impression, were dim. She was only six when he was killed; ten when he was re-buried in the old graveyard at home. Not till after the founding of her U. D. C. Chapter did he become to her a hero.

Miss Angelica had often wondered what the men of that day would have done without the war. Now she wondered even more what the women would do without the U. D. C. It had found them socially divided according to their means, their ancestors and their respective churches. It brought them together more than anything since the great war it commemorated. Once more the Daughters of the Confederacy stood united, and that even the echo of strife should have this effect when peace disjoined, might have puzzled Miss Angelica had she been more given to thinking. As it was, she simply enjoyed her share of the new interest. There were meetings with and without the veterans. Various heroes emerged gallantly from the humdrum present which had so long held them unnoticed. Why, her very nearest neighbor, old Captain Fanshawe, was one of them! Sleepy and slipshod, who would have thought of him in this new light except for the Chapter meetings, the yearly reunions! Nor was this all. Various other heroes seemed to rise from their long sleep in old fields or neglected brier-patches called graveyards, and cry aloud for recognition, for markers and monuments. One was her brother, Jack.

He had been killed at Cold Harbor—after seeing the war nearly through. He had died leading a charge. What a shame, it seemed all at once, that he should have gone so long without a stone to mark his grave!

But there had been little money for such things all these years. Not even her father or mother had anything of the sort; the tombs in the old family plot belonging to an older generation. The further back, the handsomer. Well, Miss Angelica reflected, papa and mamma were so good! They could wait. Being certainly in heaven, God would help them to find their bodies on Resurrection Day. But Jack—she had heard that he was rather thoughtless and harrumscarum. He might need some help. She would help him.

She began to save for this object, and the sum slowly grew. She selected by catalogue the sort of stone she wanted, "one that would not tumble down." So many of the old stones were always tumbling down. She also chose the verse to go on it. One Sunday in church it struck her as singularly suitable:

"He shall deliver their souls from falsehood and wrong, and dear shall their blood be in His sight."

She made a note. Yes, it was suitable.

So she dwelt on her cherished plan. It was all settled and the money needed almost ready when something happened which made the Confederacy seem somehow faint and far off. War—real and terrible, war of today—the great war, began.

For the first time in her life Miss Angelica took a daily paper.

As she read the news therein contained she did not forget Jack's monument, but she had the instinct, wait! There were such awful things happening, such calls for money. The Belgians, the Serbians, the Armenians—they were so desperately needy, so unfortunate in a way, that one had to give a little. It really seemed wicked to use cash for any other purpose not strictly necessary. Though she could not take from that sacred heap, it grew very slowly.

And as days and months passed a queer feeling came to Miss Angelica. It was that Jack, the very person to be honored, might not want the money now spent so. At one time Jack had seemed to her very dead. She had no picture of him to keep faint childish memories green. They had faded almost away before the U. D. C. revival of interest. Now he seemed quite alive—and sometimes quite near. She thought of him, a typical figure in Confederate gray, always shaking his head at her. It was disconcerting.

One autumn evening not long past Miss Angelica Bland might have been seen wending her way to the old graveyard afore-mentioned. She was in a happy mood. A long-desired plan was on the eve of fulfillment. Many startling things had happened lately. We ourselves were now in the war. The country was pulsing with the consciousness of the mighty fact. Men must fight—women help in some way. How soon? and how best? were the great questions. But Miss Angelica, though moved, had stuck to her main point. Like many gentle and timid persons she was obstinate. In spite of queer impressions and feelings to the contrary, she had added, by means of special saving, the last dollar to her hoard. The needed sum was in hand. She was going to send her order for the stone next day. She now wished one more look at the spot to be marked.

It was a corner of the old neglected graveyard not graced with stones. Some of these, quite old and interesting, even ornate, glimmered quaintly at her from a nearby tangle of shrubbery. But Miss Angelica was no antiquary. Skulls and cross-bones, cherub-heads and weeping willows had no charms for her. She cared not for them. She had kept this, her special corner, at least free from briars. At her mother's grave was a moss rose-bush, at her father's a sturdy box-wood. Over Jack a fine young cedar, a volunteer, kept guard.

As she drew near she perceived a man leaning against this tree.

It was verging on twilight, the early dusk of a mild, hazy November evening. Only a few golden streaks yet lingered in the West, softly touching with light the thinned yellow and rust-red foliage. Frogs were chanting. Miss Angelica, usually timid where strangers were concerned, was especially so towards nightfall. Just now, strange to say, she was neither afraid nor surprised.

He seemed a young man, though worn and haggard-looking, as if with long strain or fatigue. His dark, deep-set eyes were sunken, yet sweet. A bitter-sweet smile hung round his mouth. On one side of his face, from brow to chin, was a long faint scar curved like the letter C. In one hand, with the carelessness as of long practice, he held a gun. His hat, his clothes were of dingy gray, melting cloudily into the twilight.

He looked at Miss Angelica; she at him. What little light there was seemed concentrated on his face, so that she saw it quite clearly.

She saw also, or fancied she saw, some traces of earth-molds upon it, and upon his garments. Had he fallen? But there was no bruise visible. He was holding one hand over his left breast, as if to hide something there. It was all very peculiar; and still Miss Angelica did not feel afraid.

She paused, gazing and smiling. Somehow no formal salutation seemed needed.

"Do you know who is buried there?" she asked.

(To be continued.)

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

XVI. Immanuel's Land.

This hymn, though not included in our Church collection, is well known to many of us. The air to which it is set is of such poignant sweetness that, once heard, it sings itself into the memory, while the words take a strange hold on the heart.

The author was Samuel Rutherford, a Scottish divine who lived three hundred years ago at Anworth. At the age of twenty-three he was appointed "professor of humanity" at Edinburgh University, but two years later he was dismissed. "His unorthodox views began to draw him steadily into deeper and deeper waters. Again and again he was deposed from the high offices that he held, and once—for in those days Church discipline took strange liberties—he was incarcerated in the dungeons of St. Andrew. Later on he fell into serious political trouble. But his spirit was never for an instant broken. We cannot doubt that whatever opinions he held or did not hold, he preached only what he staunchly believed. His dying cry was, "Glory, glory dwelleth in Immanuel's land!"

The hymn is too long to be given in its entirety; in truth, it is more of a ballad than a hymn. In its nineteen double stanzas Rutherford sets forth his own history—not bitterly, not even sadly, but with a wealth of significant detail. Throughout the whole runs a thread of home-sickness for Anworth, the little town that was probably the seat of his chief persecution. From the first line to the last the poem is the cry of a heart from which the clouds of this world cannot shut out the vision of the imperishable light of the world to come.

The sands of time are sinking,
The dawn of Heaven breaks,
The summer morn I've sighed for—
The fair, sweet morn—awakes.
Dark, dark hath been the midnight,
But day spring is at hand,
And glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's land.

O well, it is forever,
O well, forevermore;
My nest hung in no forest
Of all this death-domed shore;
Yea, let this vain world vanish
As from the ship the strand,
While glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's land.

Some of the other verses, that are not included in the hymnals, are of pathetic beauty. As the old saint sings on, his mind reverts to those days in St. Andrew's dungeons:

Of in yon sea-beat prison
My Lord and I held tryst;
For Anworth was not Heaven
And preaching was not Christ.
And, aye, my murkiest storm-cloud
Was by a rainbow spanned,
Caught from the glory dwelling
In Immanuel's land.

But flowers need night's cool darkness
The moonlight and the dew;
So Christ, from one who loved it,
His shining oft withdrew.
And then for cause of absence
My troubled soul I scanned;
But glory shadeless dwelleth
In Immanuel's land.

Then his thoughts return with tenderness to the home of his sorrow.

The little birds of Anworth—

I used to count them blest;
Now beside happier altars
I go to build my nest;
O'er these there broods no silence.
No graves around them stand:
For glory deathless dwelleth
In Immanuel's land.

In reading the verse that follows, it is hard to repress a smile at his native doubt of Anworth's ultimate salvation—yet, too, the spirit of his yearning forgiveness is well-nigh divine:

Fair Anworth by the Solway,
To me thou still art dear;
E'en from the verge of Heaven
I'd drop for thee a tear.
O if one soul from Anworth
Meet me at God's right hand,
My Heaven will be two heavens
In Immanuel's land.

The hymn must have been written practically on his death-bed, for it was during his last illness that he was pre-emptorily called to appear before Parliament on a charge of high treason, and one of these stanzas refers to that incident, and to the answer of dignified defiance that he sent back: "It behoved me to obey my first summons."

They've summoned me before them,
But there I may not come;
My Lord says, "Come up hither,"
My Lord says, "Welcome home;"
My King at His white throne
My presence doth command,
Where glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's land.

There is one portion, indeed, that can scarcely have been the speech of any save a pilgrim very near the border line of life. It rings with the prophecy of imminent eternal things:

I've wrestled on toward Heaven
'Gainst storm and wind and tide;
Now, like a weary traveler
That leans upon his guide,
Amid the shades of evening,
While sinks life's lingering sand,
I hail the glory dawning
In Immanuel's land!

Grateful For—What.

When God keeps pouring into our lives a steady stream of events that we count blessings, we sometimes lose the fine edge of our gratitude. When the stream is halted by what some may think is anything but a blessing, then we are tempted to wonder why God is changing his attitude toward us. But the trouble is that we are so often attempting to define blessings in terms of our preferences, and not in terms of God's unfailing love. It is far from safe to let gratitude be measured by our notions of what we need. Gratitude leaps from our glad hearts without measure when we look beyond every event of life into the inexhaustible depths of God's measureless love.—Selected.

There is one thing with which I am tempted to be somewhat impatient. It is when I hear, in missionary addresses, the phrase, "If you can do nothing else, you can pray," as though prayer were the easiest thing in the world. It is the hardest thing to do for foreign missions. It is much easier to read, or to give, or to go, than to pray. If a man begins to pray for foreign missions, he will find that it takes spiritual power and energy, if his prayer is to be real. Let us make prayer among the most prominent features of our life, as we pray for worldwide evangelization.—W. H. G. Thomas.

Miss Hurry and Miss Steady.

Little Miss Hurry,
All hustle and flurry,
Comes down to her breakfast ten minutes too late;
Her hair is a-rumple,
Her gown is a-crumple,
She's no time to button and hook herself straight.
She hunts and she rushes
For needles and brushes,
For books and pencils flies upstairs and down;
If ever you'd find her,
Just follow behind her
A trail of shoe-buttons and shreds of her gown.

But little Miss Steady
By school time is ready,
All smiling and shining and neat in her place;
With no need to worry,
She pities Miss Hurry,
Who but yesterday sat here with shame in her face.
Her heart beating lightly,
With duty done rightly,
She vows she will never again change her name;
For, though you'd not guess it—
I'm bound to confess it—
These two little maidens are one and the same.

What Happened to the Little Run- Away Child.

Once upon a time there was a little baby girl who liked to run away. She lived in a little village near the big woods. It made no difference what her mother said; it made no difference what her father said. The baby girl ran away every day, and every day her brothers and sisters were sent to find her and bring her home. And that is why the brothers and sisters called the baby their run-away child.

One day there was a performing bear in the village, and all the family went early to see him except the run-away child and her mother.

"The baby must have her nap," mother said, "so I shall stay at home and put her to bed as usual and take her to see the fun afterwards."

When the run-away child was sound asleep, her mother took a nap, too. Soon the child awoke and sat up. Then she slid off the bed and pattered into the living-room. She saw her mother lying on the couch sound asleep. So the baby pushed open the screen door and ran away. She went no farther than the house of the nearest neighbor. First she looked into the windows and saw no one. She tried to open the back door, but it was locked. The family who lived in the house had gone to see the performing bear. But the little girl, who was the last to leave the house, was in such a hurry that she did not close the door tight. The door was the kind that locked itself when it was closed and could not be opened from the outside only with a key. The big girl supposed she had locked the front door behind her when she followed the family down the street.

The run-away child pushed open that front door and walked in. She walked through the house downstairs. There was no one there. She walked through the house upstairs. There was no one there. The big girl's doll was in its cradle in the front bed-room. The run-away child picked up the child and listened. She listened because she thought she heard steps in the house downstairs. She did. Her mother had missed her baby. The run-away child hid behind the bed-room door and kept as still as a mouse until her mother went away. Mother closed the front door behind her tight, and that time it was locked.

The run-away child did not know she was locked in, so she played with the big girl's doll and had a good time until the clock in the hall downstairs struck "One, two, three." Then the baby wanted to go home. She remembered about the performing bear. Then she wished that she had not run away.

The child put the big girl's doll back in its cradle and went downstairs to the front door. She couldn't open it. She went to the back door and tried that. She could not open it. She tried the side door, but that was locked too. All the windows were closed.

The run-away child began to cry. She called and called her mother, but her mother did not hear. From one window to another of the big, lonely house went the little girl, and she cried until her eyes were red and swollen. Then the clock struck "One, two, three, four."

Just as the clock stopped striking, a boy who was passing saw the run-away child in the window. "I can't get out! I can't get out!" she wailed.

"They are turning the country upside down and inside out looking for you," answered the boy in cross tones. "I'll tell everybody you are found; but the performing bear has gone, and you won't see it."

In a few minutes back came the family who lived in the house. The mother had the key, so she unlocked the door. Back came the little girl's mother with her family. She had been crying too, and so had all the children in the family.

"I'll never run away again," promised the run-away child, with both arms tight around her mother's neck.

"I certainly hope you never will," answered her mother.

The mother's hope came true, because that was the last time the baby of that family ever ran away. But from that day to this there has never been another performing bear in the little village near the big woods, and that is how it happens that the little girl who used to be called the run-away child has never seen a bear. She has never seen anything but pictures of bears!—Frances Margaret Fox.

Who Ate the Ring?

Harold was having a birthday party because he was six years old; and Aunt Helen and grandma and Miss Nellie and ever so many big people were there helping all the little people to have a splendid time. They played games and sat in the darkened parlor to look at the magic lantern pictures till the clock struck five, and then Harold knew what was coming.

Out in the dining-room the table was set with mother's prettiest china, and there were candles and flowers and bonbons just like a grown-up party.

Harold was very anxious to have all the children see the table. So he was glad when Aunt Helen said, "Now we are going to march to the dining-room."

Miss Nellie played a bright little march and the boys formed a long line through the parlor and out on the piazza, "just like a long white ribbon," said grandma; for most of the girls wore white dresses and the boys white waists.

The tiny sandwiches and wee pickles vanished like magic and all the grown-up people were kept busy waiting on the little folks. Playing games makes one very hungry, you know, and most of the guests had been too excited to eat much dinner that day. Altogether, it was a very jolly supper; and when mother wanted to make a little speech she had to ring the tea bell several times. "Now, children," she said, "I am going to pass some little cakes, and one of them has a ring baked in it. You must eat them very slowly and carefully, so some one does not swallow it. You must not break up the cakes to find the ring, but just nibble away till some little boy or girl says: 'I've got the ring.'"

Aunt Helen brought in ice cream made to look like dear little chickens, and the children ate the cakes and cream very slowly. At last all had been eaten, and still no one said, "I've got the ring."

"That is very strange," said mother. "I will ask Mary if any one took one of the cakes."

"No, ma'am," said the maid, positively. "There has been no one but me in the dining-room since I put the cakes on the table."

"I just know I swallowed it," sobbed a little girl. "I felt it going down."

"So did I," said a tiny boy. And he had to cry, too.

"There, there!" said Mrs. Clifford, much perplexed. "Two of you couldn't have eaten it. So don't cry."

"I feel bad, too," said another little girl. "I think it must have been in my cake."

I really don't know what would have happened just then if father hadn't come in. He was so surprised to see tears at a birthday party that he had to inquire the cause, though he was in a big hurry.

"Well, well," he laughed. "I didn't know what a commotion I would cause taking one cake. I was on my way to see a little patient who had been in bed a long time with a lame leg, and I wanted to take her some of the goodies. I slipped softly in here a while ago and took some of the nice things without disturbing the party a bit. Even Mary did not see me. Now, I just wonder if little Bess Ryan isn't wearing that ring this minute?"

"Oh, father, won't you go right over and see?" begged Harold.

"I hope she did get it," cried all the children.

Sure enough, in a few minutes Dr. Clifford came back to tell how happy the little girl was with her treasure. "She was sitting propped up in her old bed, looking at the pretty green stone in the gold bangle," said father, "and I didn't go in at all. Are you all glad poor Bess got it?"

"Yes, yes, yes!" cried the children.—Hilda Richmond, in Sunday School Times.

Making a Toy Farmyard.

You have some toy farmyard animals, a little horse, a cow, and some woolly sheep, but you wish so much that you had a farmyard for them to live in! You went to grandfather's big green farm last summer, and you remember just how it looked.

Why not make a toy farmyard, then, for the little animals? It will be the best kind of fun for a rainy day, and will last for your play on many other days, too.

Get out your kindergarten scissors, your jar of paste and your scraps of colored paper. Then ask mother if she will give you some strong, empty cardboard boxes. These are just what you need for making the toy farmyard.

The big box that your new coat came in, without the cover, is the farmyard itself. Perhaps you will be able to cut the sides to look like a fence, and it will need a gate in front. Line the bottom with green crepe paper, to be the grass, and glue some small branches to the sides for trees.

An empty shoe-box will make a very good barn. Cover it with red paper or brown wrapping-paper, so that it will be the right color. Cut windows in the ends and stand it on a long narrow side in the corner of the farmyard. This leaves the whole front open to let the horse and the cow go in and out easily.

Pieces of the shoe-box cover can be cut and pasted in, to make the stalls of the barn. Empty match-boxes glued to the walls make food troughs. A pill-box, glued to an empty twist spool, makes a little milking-stool. You may glue another empty match-box to the barn roof to be a pigeon-house.

A box in which spools of thread came is just the best kind of box for making your farm wagon. If mother has four large, wooden button-molds, you may ask her if you may glue them to the box to make the cart-wheels. The round cardboard tops to milk bottles make very good wheels for a toy cart, too. Strips of cardboard cut from the cover of the spool-box and glued to your cart make the shafts.

You can fill the farm wagon with make-believe hay, made by cutting yellow or brown crepe paper into strips. Then harness the little farm horse to the wagon and let him draw the load of hay to the barn. Tiny brown pebbles will look like potatoes, and some day you can load the cart with these.

You can dress clothes-pins in blue crepe paper, overalls and coats, pencil their faces on the round ends, and glue on wide paper hats. Then you have the farmer himself, the hired man and the teamster.

Oblong strips of rather heavy brown paper, folded like a tent, will make chicken-coops, and perhaps you have some wee Easter chickens left to live inside.

Paste green paper leaves to the trees in the farmyard when you want to play that it is summer time, and bright colored ones when you want it fall. Some cotton batting spread over the grass and on the roof of the barn will make it winter.

Is it not a delightful toy, since it will last all the year for your play?—Caroline Sherwin Bailey.

Faith does not consist in thinking that my sins are comparatively little, and therefore may be forgiven; but in believing that, though they are ever so many and great, past or present, Christ's blood is above them all.—Thomas Adam.

Little Brother Chinquapin.

Little Brother Chinquapin,
With your gypsy face,
Time the autumn months begin,
Prompt you take your place,

Camping by the roadside near,
Tenting in the wood,
What a cheery smile you wear
Underneath your hood!

Though you're mighty light and small,
Though you're named a name
Few can spell and some can't call,
Welcome, all the same!

Sister Chestnut's just as brown,
Bigger, maybe better;
But they have to shake her down
When they want to get her.

You, so quick to tumble in,
Ready when I ask it;
Little Brother Chinquapin,
Hop into my basket!

The Turkey Call.

"What is this?" asked Alice, picking up a queer looking piece of wood from the treasure chest.

"That is a turkey call," said great-grandmother with her eyes beginning to twinkle. "It is another story about Wenonah, my Indian friend."

"Oh, goody!" said Alice, settling herself.

"When I was six father said I was old enough to do as the other children, so he gave me three turkeys from the flock for my very own. 'If I fed them, and brought them up all right, I was to have the money they brought when father sold the whole flock at Thanksgiving time to a man who would take them to a city for Thanksgiving. When I learned that I might get as much as two dollars for my three turkeys I was greatly excited.

"Well, I took good care of them. I kept the water-pail out in the orchard filled. I carried food twice a day. I didn't get very fond of my turkeys, for in my day they were even wilder than they are now. They wouldn't grow friendly, but stayed far from me, and regarded me with suspicious looks. At night they roosted in trees, and two or three times they wandered away into the woods, and father and big brother Hugh had to go after them and drive them back. Then for some time in the fall they stayed about home. I began to count on the two dollars, for my turkeys were large and fat. Father was pleased that I had taken such good care of them. Then one day a week before Thanksgiving Hugh and I went out to feed the flock, and they didn't come. We went about the orchard and barnyard calling, but they were gone. Hugh and father quickly got ready and went into the woods. They searched till noon, but found no trace of the turkeys. 'They are gone for good this time,' said father gloomily. 'They've joined some wild flock.' Can you imagine how I felt.

"After dinner I had no tasks, because I was too young for much work or lessons, so I wandered out in the woods. I took the bag of grain that I carried over my shoulder when I went to feed the turkeys, but of course I couldn't find them.

"I met Wenonah as I wandered about calling for them, and told her what had happened.

"Come home with me," said Wenonah; 'my brother will find them for you.'

"I ran along with her quickly enough. Her big brother was just getting ready to go fishing. But he put down the things, and came with us pleasantly. Out in the woods he put this bit of wood to his mouth and blew on it. It sounded almost exactly like a turkey calling its 'Quit! Quit! Quit!' in a high key. That is the turkey call by which wild turkeys call one another. The first call brought no answer. So we walked farther. I was used to running miles every day, so I didn't get tired. The third time the Indian boy gave the call we heard an answer coming back, faintly. I jumped with joy. "Wait," said the Indian, 'it might be wild turkeys.'

"We traveled toward the sound, the Indian boy calling as we went. And the turkeys were coming toward us. If they were wild turkeys they would fly away as soon as they saw us, but ours would not. So when the flock came in sight they did not rise to fly. They wouldn't come close, but they knew that bag at my side, and they waited.

"You haven't much grain, little sister, so you must be very careful," said the boy. 'Walk a little way and throw out a single handful. Then when they have eaten that, go farther and throw out another handful. Perhaps you can coax them home that way, and then they will wait to be fed as usual.'

"I did as he told me, walking toward home, and throwing out a little grain now and then. The turkeys kept a good distance behind us, but still they did follow. Great was the surprise of the family when we three chil-

When the Bird Flies Home.

A London boy, we are told, takes orders for his father's shop and sends them in by the funniest messenger you ever heard of. When he goes out on his morning trips he takes with him half a dozen of the swiftest homing pigeons. From place to place he travels till he has twelve orders. Then he puts them all in a little metal case, which is tied to the foot of one of the pigeons. Away home the bird flies. The father is watching, and in less than five minutes after the bird is released he has the order in the shop. These orders on the way, the boy goes on till he has covered his ground. The boy says: "The birds will travel more than a mile a minute. I never knew one of them to go astray."—Exchange.

How Birds Sleep.

Birds generally sleep with their heads turned tailward over the back and the beak thrust beneath the wing.

Storks, gulls and other long-legged birds sleep standing on one leg.

Ducks sleep in open water. To avoid drifting ashore, they keep paddling with one foot, thus making them move in a circle.

Owls, in addition to their eyelids, have a screen that they draw sideways across their eyes to shut out the light, for they sleep in the daytime.—Select.

Obstructed Gateways.

For the most part God has succeeded in getting His message spoken, and His power imparted, through the gateway of a human personality. The patriarchs and prophets were God's messengers to men in the noble past. They were inspired and clothed with a divine power, and God's truth found utterance, and God's power was made manifest. When prophets went wrong, and were false to their trust, then the gateway of Divine revelation and Divine power was obstructed, and the people suffered. The prophet puts it this way: "Where there is no vision the people perish."

Under the new dispensation of the Gospel the day of miracles was superseded by the ministry of men who were to make the will of God known to the world under the direction of the Holy Spirit.

These servants of God are the gateways through which the truth and the power of God get out into the world, and work its regeneration. Jesus said to those early followers: "Ye are My witnesses." He laid upon them the burden of making Himself known to the world, and through them we have entered into the same wonderful mission. We are the witnesses of Jesus.

To be faithful to this great mission, we must first consent to the plan. Then through us, as through a gateway, the Holy Spirit passes out into the world with His saving and sanctifying power.

But we may obstruct the gateway. We may refuse to be used as the way through which God is made manifest to men. We can hinder the reign of grace in the world, because, so far as we know, God has no other way to get Himself expressed in all His love and mercy except through the medium of the personality of His children. If we refuse, God is powerless, unless He changes His plan.

It follows, then, that there is no more serious and tragic thing in all the world than the failure of a Christian professor to incarnate the Spirit of Jesus.

He is an obstructed gateway, by which a world of good is denied entrance into the heart and life of man. Is the gateway of your life open for the passing out of the influences of the Holy Spirit into the world? If it is not, open it wide, and joy that through you a man can enter into eternal life, and a world have the sweet and satisfying vision of a perfect redemption, will be yours.—Methodist Protestant.

This is an imperial era in the history of the world. All doors of opportunity are wide open. Christ calls for high-souled men and women who will go with Him, not in the ignoble spirit of grudging service, but in the joyous spirit of full surrender.—A. J. Brown.

As We Forgive.

"The Lord's Prayer," says Richard, of Saint Victor, "is a water so shallow that a lamb may wade in it, and yet so deep that an elephant may swim in it." The child who learns it at his mother's knee finds it no puzzle of strange and mysterious words. The greatest theologian sees depth in it beyond his sound. Luther wrote exposition upon exposition of it, and then went to heaven to learn its full sense.

One of the petitions which does or ought to arouse thought in us is that which seems to equalize our forgiveness of those who have wronged us with that which God shows to us. The offenses we endure are so trifling in comparison with those we inflict upon God by our sins, that there seems an incongruity here. And this is the more impressive because it seems to promise us that, if we forgive these small matters, God will forgive the sinfulness of our sins.

The seeming incongruity is in part due to our superficial view of what man's forgiveness of man must be when real and genuine. Our brother offends us in some way that ruffles our temper and excites our indignation. We regard his offense as purely personal toward ourselves, and for the time we are angry. Then with the lapse of time a different mood comes over us, our "good nature" gets the upper hand, and we say we have forgiven him. And the next time we utter this great petition it is with a degree of complacency. We may actually feel that we have complied with God's condition for forgiving us.

The wrongness of all this is first of all in our cheap appraisal of the wrongdoing, as if it were an offense against ourselves only, and not against the moral order of God's universe. We make the offense—even if it be a real one—altogether too small a thing to need deep feeling. We are not stirred, as Jesus was, to our depths by the wrongness of wrong. Consequently we feel neither the indignation nor the pity which the situation calls for. We do not hate the sin as God hates every sin, even the smallest! And we do not pity the sinner as God pities him, even the worst of sinners. After such a replacement of egotistic anger by mere careless "good nature," we have no right to plead our act as being such a forgiveness as is to be named in the same breath with the forgiveness of God.

As Dr. P. T. Forsyth says, it costs God something to forgive sin; and while that saying does not cover the whole field of Christ's sacrifice, it has far-reaching suggestion toward our understanding of it. So when we pray, "Forgive us our trespasses," we are asking for Jesus Christ and all He is and can do for our restoration to sinless fellowship with His Father.

Now, while human forgiveness can never parallel God's forgiveness, nor does the Lord's Prayer teach that, nevertheless in a true human forgiveness there is involved the purpose and the effort of restoration of the offender, not merely to a pleasurable sense of our good nature toward him, but to a better life, in which he will live on a far higher level, and get nearer to God. "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual," or faultless, "restore such an one in the spirit of meekness." His fault, even if known only to you and offending you only, is a summons to Christ-like love and activity.

What we often call forgiveness is cheap enough and fruitless enough, and, therefore, quite unlike to that of God. His cannot be named beside that, as our Lord names real forgiveness when He teaches us to pray, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us"—for that, let us be thankful, is not how God forgives.

Our God is not "the God of infinite good nature," which Coleridge said was worshipped by the Unitarians. He is the God of infinite hate for things hateful, of infinite love for things lovely, and of forgiving love toward those who have turned from sin through His Son.—S. S. Times.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

A Farewell Luncheon was given the Rev. Dr. Edward H. Ward on Monday, September 23d, the occasion being his retirement from the rectorship of St. Peter's Church, Pittsburgh, after an incumbency of twenty-one years. The Bishop of the Diocese presided, and there were twenty-two of the clergy present. The Rev. Dr. Vance as President of the Standing Committee was Chairman of the gathering, and brief addresses were made by Bishop Whitehead, the Rev. Drs. Vance and McIlvaine, and the Rev. L. F. Cole, with regard to the work Dr. Ward had done, and expressing the regret of the clergy at his removal from the Diocese. Dr. Ward will have charge for the winter months of St. Luke's, Hot Springs, Va. He will be succeeded in St. Peter's Parish by the Rev. Dr. H. A. Flint, of the Church of the Nativity, Crafton, who will enter upon the work on October 1st.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. James B. Funston, D. D., Bishop.

Consecration of the Cathedral.

St. Michael's Cathedral, Boise, was consecrated on Sunday morning, September 15th, by Bishop Funston. The largest congregation ever gathered within its walls was in attendance, comprising not only the Churchmen of the city, but others from many other points in the Diocese. The instrument of donation was read by Mr. R. M. Davidson, Senior Warden, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Alward Chamberlaine, the Dean.

The sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D. D., the Presiding Bishop of the Church, under whom the work in Idaho was begun more than fifty years ago and who had journeyed from St. Louis to Boise for the purpose. His text was Psalm 50: 23: "Whoso offereth me thanks and praise, he honoreth me; and to him that ordereth his conversation right will I show the salvation of God." He extended his congratulations to the Bishop and Dean and the congregation on being able to present the Cathedral free of debt, and spoke of the place of worship in the life of God's people.

The Cathedral was completed in 1901, but a large debt remained on the building. Seven thousand dollars of this remained when the present Dean took charge of the work about two years ago. Through his energetic efforts the last of debt was paid off on Easter last, making the consecration possible.

Among the clergymen of the District present and taking part in the services were Archdeacon Stoy, the Rev. Dr. McLean and the Rev. Messrs. Ashworth, Simmons and Jones.

Personal Notes

The Rev. James H. Montgomery, D. D., who has had charge of work under the Church War Commission at Camp Meade, Md., during the past summer, has returned to his duties at the Philadelphia Divinity School and the University of Pennsylvania.

The vestry of R. E. Lee Memorial Church, Lexington, Va., has refused to accept the resignation of the Rev. C. J. Gibson, who has been attending the Chaplains' Training School in Kentucky, and received orders for overseas duty, and has granted him leave of absence for the duration of the war.

The Rev. Dr. Joseph P. McComas on October 1st became vicar of St. Paul's Chapel, Trinity Parish, New York City, in succession to the Rev. Dr. W. Montague Geer, who retired on that date and became vicar emeritus. Dr. McComas will retain the senior curacy of Trinity Church.

The Rev. Edward R. Noble has resigned the charge of All Saints' Church, Norristown, Pa.

The address of the Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., is changed to 903 James Street, Syracuse, N. Y.

The Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Minneapolis, Minn., has been called to the rectorship of Old Trinity Church, Chicago, Ill.

The Rev. Harris B. Thomas, rector of Trinity Church, Rochester, N. Y., has resigned to accept the position of

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

are very improper, according to Lucy Oppen, in Good Housekeeping. "But," she adds, "a fresh egg will keep fresh for four months in the right cold-storage conditions.

"A fresh egg, laid during the cool months of spring, and kept continuously cool in cold storage, will remain a fresh egg for four months or so without the slightest deterioration in taste or quality. It will be superior to the highest grade of 'fresh-laid' eggs laid during the hot summer months and brought into the city directly from the farm. However, if the egg laid during the cool spring months and put into storage immediately is kept longer than four months it will develop a musty or a 'storage' taste which interferes seriously with its palatability, though not with its wholesomeness. On this account eggs are kept in storage on an average of six months. The flush season for the production of eggs, as every housekeeper knows, is during the months of March, April, May and June. It is during these months that the supply exceeds the demand, and that the surplus is put into cold storage. By the end of June it has been estimated that there are perhaps six million, five hundred thousand cases of eggs in cold storage. During the months of summer, fall and winter, these reserve supplies are drawn upon and thousands of cases are taken out of storage every month until, in December, very few are left. From then on until the new supply begins to come in in the spring, housewives are buying cold-storage eggs whether they know it or not."

Ask the first hundred strong, healthy people you meet to what they owe their strength and see how many reply "Nuxated Iron." Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital, (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital, says: "Thousands of people suffer from iron deficiency but do not know what to take. There is nothing like organic iron—Nuxated Iron, to enrich the blood, make beautiful, healthy women, and strong, vigorous men. To make absolutely sure that my patients get real organic iron and not some form of the metallic variety, I always prescribe Nuxated Iron in its original packages. Nuxated Iron will increase the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, run-down folks in two weeks' time in many instances."

Manufacturers' Note: Nuxated Iron recommended above by Dr. Sullivan can be obtained from any good druggist with or without a physician's prescription on an absolute manufacturers' guarantee of success or money refunded.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The soul would have no rainbow had the eyes no tears.

Some people look happiest when they have bad news to tell.

Don't lose any sleep worrying about God's part of your work.

Persecuting a good man is the devil's way of showing that he hates righteousness.

It would be a sorry world if God had left us out of His plans as we leave Him out of ours.

No case is recorded in the Bible where anybody was ever slain while running toward a city of refuge.

The first effect of conversion is that we see the world and ourselves from a standpoint altogether new.

How many there are who will have to confess with Grotius, as the shadows deepen, "I have spent my life laboriously doing nothing."

By doing good with his money a man, as it were, stamps the image of God upon it and makes it pass current for the merchandise of heaven.—Rutledge.

It is not unworthiness, but unwillingness, that bars any man from God. Thousands have missed Him by their unwillingness, but He never put off one soul on account of its unworthiness.

Every friendship that lasts is built of certain durable materials. The first of these is truthfulness. If I cannot look into the eyes of my friend and speak out always the truthful thought and feeling with the simplicity of a little child, there can be no real friendship between us.

The more varied and manifold a man's experiences have become, the more he has the chance to know of God, the more chance God has to show

Himself to him. Every new experience is like a jewel set in the texture of our life, on which God shines and makes interpretations and revelations of Himself.—Phillips Brooks.

From all thou holdest precious, for one hour

Arise and cast away,
And let the calling voice be heard in power;

Desert thyself today;
If with thy Lord for once thou turn aside,

With Him thou'lt fain abide.

It is always easier to begin than to continue, to work than to wait, to mount up with wings of eagles than to walk and not faint. The years of our youth, when our hearts are full of dreams, and we are eager and active in the fields of high endeavor, do not strain us so much as the years when our steps are slow and we can only wait. We have but to tarry the Lord's leisure, and in due course God will remember us and all others who are the burdens of our hearts.

Let me not pass till eve,

Till that day's fight is done;

What soldier cares to leave

The field until it's won!

And I have loved my work and fain

Would be deemed worthy of the ranks again.

Let twilight come, then night,

And when the first birds sing

Their matin songs, and light

Wakens each slumbering thing;

Let some one waken me, and set

My feet to steps that lead me upward yet.

THE STORY OF A GREAT DISCOVERY.

The hardships of a traveling salesman's life had wrecked my health. My family physician diagnosed my case as chronic gastritis, brought on by disease of the liver and complicated by kidney trouble. I consulted specialists in Columbia and New York who confirmed his diagnosis. Months passed, I grew worse and was finally compelled to give up any work.

By chance I heard of some wonderful recoveries which had resulted from drinking the water of a little spring in the Mineral Belt of South Carolina, a picture of which spring appears on this page. In desperation I tried it. On the second day I thought that I could notice some improvement; at the end of the first week my appetite and digestion had returned and I was much stronger; at the end of the third week I felt that I was completely restored. That was eight years ago and I still enjoy perfect health.

Knowing that it had restored my health and believing that it had saved my life, I bought the Spring.

I then determined to see whether the water would restore others as it had me. During the year I shipped ten gallons absolutely free of charge to each of one thousand sufferers from chronic diseases. Only four reported "no benefit" from the ten gallons. The other nine hundred and ninety-six reported decided benefit or complete restoration. Many claimed that the water had saved their lives.

I realized that I had discovered one of the world's greatest mineral springs, and I decided to devote the remainder of my life to it. But how could I make the world listen; how could I make them believe my story? The precious water was running to waste while thousands were suffering. I said, I will make them believe me by showing my faith in them and in the restorative power of the Spring. I will tell them that the water shall cost them nothing if it fails to benefit.

The world listened!

Some wrote for proof and I sent them the letters which I had received from their fellowmen. Others accepted my offer without question. Thousands have written me reporting relief and permanent restoration from a great variety of chronic diseases.

But some of the water still ran to waste for lack of belief. I determined that every drop should be used to relieve the suffering of humanity. To this end I requested a physician friend of mine to come to see me. At my desk I opened my mail and showed him the letters from men and women from all parts of the country who had suffered and who had found relief. I gave him my letter file and induced him to spend several days reading my past correspondence with those who were using the water. I showed him the chemical analysis and letters from physicians explaining the medicinal properties of the water.

He believed, and as a result he has written this announcement for me.

WILL YOU BELIEVE?

I do not ask your implicit faith; only enough to try the water for three weeks as I did. I estimate that I drank about ten gallons, and I, therefore, offer gladly to ship you two five-gallon demijohns on my guarantee that if you find that it does not benefit you I will promptly refund the price, which is only $2.00. You must promise to drink the water in accordance with the instructions which I will send you and return the empty demijohns. I make you the sole judge as to whether the water has benefited you. I guarantee to refund your money if you are not benefited. I hope you will feel perfectly free to accept my offer.

This offer is extended to all who suffer with any chronic disease, except cancer and consumption; but I especially recommend the water for the treatment of stomach, liver, kidney and bladder diseases and for rheumatism, gout, uric acid poisoning, gall stones, diabetes, nervous headache and general debility resulting from impure or impoverished blood. These are the diseases most frequently mentioned in the thousands of letters which I have received; but my offer is open to any one who suffers from any chronic ailment. Yours sincerely,

N. F. SHIVAR, Proprietor.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.:
Dear Sir—As you are well aware, in 1909 I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrible phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered 10 gallons of your Mineral Water, which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months from date I began drinking it gained 28 lbs., was strong and perfectly well and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

Shivar Spring, Shelton, S. C.:
Gentlemen—I have suffered for years with nervous indigestion and kidney troubles. Derived more benefit from the Shivar Spring Water than from months at Hot Springs, Ark., and numerous other springs. I consider it the very best water extant.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.: Dear Sir—I suffered with intestinal indigestion and the Shivar Spring Water has completely restored me. I would gladly recommend it to all suffering with indigestion, kidney and liver trouble. My father had kidney trouble last fall and he thought Shivar Spring Water saved his life. Respectfully,

MRS. HARVEY DIXON.

I am anxious to get more of the Water. It has done me more good than anything I have ever tried for Rheumatism.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.: Dear Sir—Until a few weeks ago my wife was a chronic sufferer from gall stones. She was stricken critically ill and nothing but morphine seemed to relieve her pain by rendering her unconscious. Rev. A. J. Foster, pastor of Shandon Baptist Church of Columbia, S. C., advised me to take her immediately to Shivar Spring. On consulting my physician he agreed that it would be best to do so without delay. In about three days after arriving at the Spring, she was apparently relieved and had regained her appetite. She has suffered no ill effect of the trouble since. Please publish this for the benefit of sufferers.

J. P. D.

P. S.—I suffered for eight years with kidney trouble and inflammation of the bladder. After using this water only a few days, I am entirely relieved and suffer no more effect of the trouble whatever.

The Eternal Recompense.

Still in my breast, despite its load of sorrow

Despite the pressure of o'erwhelming care,

I sense the thrilling joy of a to-morrow
Whose dawn shall lighten up the darkness there.

I sense a moment nigh when, woe abating,

I'll tread the path that leads on to release,

And find a cure for troubles dire awaiting,

Safe in the everlasting arms of peace.

For life and love so close are interweaving

That none can live and yet be portionless,

And days must come with hours all retrieving

The dreary years of unfound happiness;

And he whose share of love is not yet ready,

Whose measure of joy is not yet fully known.

Need only keep his faith both sure and steady

To come some time, somewhere, into his own!

—British Weekly.

Obedying God.

What is essential in us is the readiness to obey, and the eager desire that God may give us some command that we may have the joy of doing something for Him. Just as the right-minded and happy child finds a true joy in doing something because "mother" or "father" wants it, so it is with the happy and healthy Christian. It is true that we do not always understand why certain things are commanded; that does not matter. Sometimes reasons are not given us because we could not understand them if they were given; sometimes we are kept in the dark so that our faith may be tested; sometimes we are kept waiting for the light so that our joy when it comes may be all the greater; whatever the reason may be, it is good for us to keep clearly in our minds the absolute necessity of obedience.

And there is something more to be remembered; it is good for us to know that God's way for us is the way of happiness. Life is so complex, and it is so hard to choose and direct our path, so as to avoid the snares, and to attain the goal. But all this perplexity and irresolution are taken away from the soul when we learn to obey in all simplicity.

"I loved to choose and see my path,
but now
Lead Thou me on."

The soul that has learned to obey has found the center of rest and peace; and if we are willing to obey, in the end it will be made clear of us what the truth is. Obedience, it has been said, is the organ of spiritual knowledge. Christ seeks followers who will obey Him; that is not easy; it needs the surrendered soul, the humble submission of ourselves to Him. Are we ready to give Him that?—J. Macartney Wilson, in Presbyterian Witness.

War Days in London.

Each day in London now brings closer a realization of the high and honest sacrifices, the steady purpose of the women of England. Madeline Z. Doty, who has circled the globe for Good Housekeeping, has this to say of these warriors of the spirit in the October issue of that magazine:

"My three weeks in London were days of radiant spiritual delight. Neither black dresses, nor shortage of butter and sugar, nor all the anguish of the great world battle could blot out or suppress this triumph of the spirit. Life was no longer a thing of days or even years. It had leaped beyond into the ages, and down the dazzling pathway of the future shone victory and triumph. I felt it in all sorts and kinds of women, in the factory worker, the teacher, the stay-at-home mother, the suffragist, the woman preacher and artist. Each had left self and personal gain behind. The eyes of each were turned toward the little children of to-morrow.

"The women of England are giving to their uttermost. People who will surrender all material possessions for the sake of the spirit are rare. But they grow in number. These spiritual warriors are not yet appreciated. The women who act as motormen, or lay railroad tracks, or dig in the fields, or work in a munition factory, or run an ambulance at the front, or nurse the wounded, for all these women man has unstinted praise. But he needs equally the women warriors of the spirit—women who are determined that not one drop of blood shall have been shed on the battlefield in vain, women who have left men's side and in spirit crossed the front line trenches and penetrated into the camp of the enemy, women who are undermining militarism and materialism at its roots, women who know that a victory on the field of battle may be transitory, who recognize that only spiritual victory can be permanent. Such is the battle the women wage. They seek to create a new and better world, a world in which each new life shall be born unfettered.

The Big Job.

It's the biggest job the nation ever tackled;

It's the job we have to finish, come what may;

If we hope to see a groaning world unshackled,

We must do it in the biggest, grandest way.

We must rally to the banner that has never known defeat;

We must have the biggest army, we must have the biggest fleet,

And the biggest clouds of airplanes, and the biggest stores of wheat,

And we dare not grudge the price we have to pay.

When the biggest, grandest nation has to borrow,

It must do it on the biggest, grandest plan.

As you look to see the glory of to-morrow,

You must help with every dollar that you can.

It's the biggest loan for freedom and for all that's clean and fair;

And it isn't for the nabob and the multi-millionaire,

But it's you and I, the people, who must take the biggest share;

So come down with all your money, like a man!

—Arthur Guiterman, in Good Housekeeping.

A Fine Answer.

From the Alaska mines come a story which is worth repeating. A young Swede, whose opportunities had been so limited that he was nothing but a stable boy before he went to the mines, was fortunate enough to secure a good claim, and to dig a considerable amount of gold out of it. His partner, also a Swede, asked him one day: "What are you going to do with your money?" "I mean to do more for the world," was the quiet answer, "than the world ever did for me."

He meant it, too, for this ex-hostler has since given something like $50,000 to endow a college and a hospital in the far West.

The more one considers the answer and the deed, the nobler they appear. So many men ask, bitterly: "What has the world ever done for me?" and thus justify the spending of their all upon themselves. So many workers say, impatiently: "Why should I do better work than the world pays me for?" and thus toil grudgingly on. So many souls quarrel with life because it does not give them all they desire, and thus become self-pitying, self-indulgent failures. How different the spirit of this Swedish stable boy, whose generous soul accepted the hardness and indifference of the world, asked nothing from it, but desired all the more to benefit it, and make it a better place for others than it had been for him.

Such a standpoint is always a victorious one. Even if the stable boy had not found gold in the mines, he would have had richer treasures in his own heart. The man who is willing, nay, who desires, to give more than he received, can never be defeated or overcome. He has "hitched his wagon to a star," and his reward is as sure as the sweep of the stars in their courses. "I mean to do more for the world than the world ever did for me." No Sidney or Bayard ever took a nobler resolve.

While the kingdoms of this world have their day and perish, the Kingdom of God endures. Slowly the purpose of the ages is being fulfilled till in the end He will manifest Himself as the Eternal King, supremely exalted, supremely holy.—A. F. Kirkpatrick.

Office of the Chief of Staff

(Extracts from a letter dated General Headquarters, October 15, 1917.)

"... The six copies of 'The American Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing... and the remainder will be distributed to staff officers. ...

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover. ... Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc." ...

WHEN PEACE SHALL COME.

Let it be premised that this title has no reference to the futile "feelers" or propositions which are being put forth by the Teutonic powers at this time with a view to peace conferences of whatever kind. We believe that these are intended, first, as a sop to the growing element in their own countries which is weary of the war and hopeless of its outcome; and, second, to induce a relaxation of effort in the allied countries, especially our own, by creating the impression that the end of the war is at hand. The "timeliness" of these overtures, in view of our greatest Liberty Loan campaign, cannot be overlooked as an instance of German finesse. We hope they will be met by a firm insistence that the first step toward terms of peace must be the unconditional surrender, or at least the demobilization and withdrawal, of all their forces now operating with nefarious designs outside their own lands. To enforce that is our present task, and no cajoleries should be allowed to divert us for a moment from its thorough execution.

But sooner or later the war will end as we mean, God helping us, that it should end. Then will come, with the delirium of joy and the relaxation of strain and stress which peace will bring, the problems and tasks of a new era of readjustment and reconstruction. One needs to think but a little in order to realize that these will be many and of great practical importance. The wisest statesmanship will be called upon to deal with the more obvious of them and conserve the great results of the war in the sphere of national and international politics. Others must find their solution in the enlightened common-sense of the people. Some fall distinctly within the purview of the Church; while all will demand of her that leadership in thought and action which it is hers to give as the teacher and exponent of Christian truth.

Let this Church of our love and allegiance defend herself as successfully as she may against the attacks of carping critics who understand neither her mission nor her methods, she cannot stand acquitted at the bar of her own conscience of serious failures and lack of prescience and preparedness in the past. There has been an aloofness in her attitude, an academic and over-conservative note in her counsels, a lack of decision and of practical efficiency in her best meant efforts, that has militated against her influence and leadership in the moral and religious life of the country as a whole and even within her own household. It has arisen, let us say, partly from a too-great reverence for traditions which may have outlived their usefulness, partly from an over-sensitiveness in regard to the wide diversity of thought and sentiment in her own borders, and largely because of a lack of opportunity to discover her own mind and of organs of speech by which to express it.

Essentially sound in heart and ready in purpose as she is, we could wish that she were better prepared, in her unity and even her corporate capacity, to take her full and legitimate part in the era of reconstruction which is so fast approaching. Here and there voices have been raised foretelling those days and speaking in the most general terms of changing conditions to be met. Doubtless there are individuals who are earnestly thinking of them and seeking to forecast what action may be wisely taken. But would that we had a group or groups of men with clear vision and open minds who were, officially or unofficially, giving thought and preparing counsel for the guidance of our Church specifically and through her of the religious forces of the nation, in view of the larger day which is coming and the wider doors which will be open to us. When it dawns the Church ought to be ready to speak and to act promptly, unitedly, decisively and in concert with all kindred agencies sincerely and Christianly working towards the same ends. There is need of preparatory study of conditions and of possible ways of meeting them which cannot be undertaken too soon or too thoroughly.

As we learn from the very efficient Publicity Service of the Federal Council of the Churches, there are already two committees at work on these lines, representing that somewhat indeterminate entity, the churches at large. One of these is the Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War. It is under the auspices of this committee that Bishop Gore is now touring the country, seeking to inform and stimulate the public conscience in regard to the higher issues of the times. The purpose of this committee is described as being—

"the creation of public sentiment in support of our representatives at the council table concerning terms of peace, in order that the fruits of victory may not be lost, and the development of an intelligent appreciation of the value of having the world organized for right and justice.

"The Bishop of Oxford said that it is the duty of the churches to support the conscience and character of the nation in the present crisis. This duty, however, he said, is not exhausted in affording consolation for the loss of life and the assurance that the sacrifice of these lives shall not have been in vain. There are certain definite things which the Church can do by way of preparation for the days after the war by outlining a program through which the Church can approach the new problems that are arising.

"Secretary Daniels declared his confidence that the world will be saved from Prussianism, but he also said the world would not be worth saving unless the spirit of Christ permeates it and predominates it."

"The aim of the second committee is thus indicated:

"Realizing that the time has come to begin thinking out what shall be the position of the churches with reference to many questions after the coming of peace, a committee has been organized at the suggestion of the General War-Time Commission, by action of the Federal Council of the Churches. This committee is known as the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook. President North, of the Federal Council, described its purpose to be "to study quietly as we may, deeply as we should, those deep spiritual implications and those practical questions that have to do with the conditions of religious life." He stated distinctly that while organized by the Administrative Committee of the Federal Council, this is not to be considered a committee of the Federal Council. The committee is left to develop its own organization and its own program. The chairman, President Henry Churchill King, after determining with other members the questions which it is desired to study, has gone abroad to make a personal examination. For the present communications meant for the committee should be sent to the vice-chairman, Rev. William Adams Brown. The other members of the committee are: President Henry Churchill King, chairman; Professor William Adams Brown, vice-chairman; Bishop J. W. Bashford, Mrs. Fred S. Bennett,

"---To the Last Man and the Last Dollar"

President Wilson

The Last man will be ready. Let your last Dollar be enlisted also in the Fourth Liberty Loan.

Miss Mabel Cratty, Mr. George W. Coleman, President W. H. P. Faunce, Rev. Harry E. Fosdick, Rev. Samuel G. Inman, Professor Charles M. Jacobs, Bishop Walter R. Lambuth, Bishop Frances J. McConnell, Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, President William Douglas Mackenzie, Dean Shailer Mathews, Dr. John R. Mott, President E. Y. Mullins, Rev. Frank Mason North, the Very Rev. Wilford R. Robbins, Dr. Robert E. Speer, Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, Rev. James I. Vance, Rev. Henry B. Washburn."

Naturally this Church is represented on both of these committees; though, owing to the timidity of a certain wing in the General Convention, the Church is not represented in the Federal Council except through two of its commissions. This Council, and its War-Time Commission, are doing an extensive and valuable work in these times, speaking and acting as no other bodies can, for the Christian solidarity of the country, though lacking, of course, the efficiency that can only come from a closer and more real bond of unity. It is a pity that our Church is not more closely connected with this Council. It means for her the loss of opportunity, the withholding to a certain extent of the talent intrusted to her. Let us hope that she will not be found wanting when called upon to act in co-ordination with all Christian forces around her in the issues of the future.

By arrangement between the World's Sunday-school Association and the American Red Cross, the Rev. Stephen Trowbridge has just begun relief work in Palestine. He has had the utmost success in such work in Turkey and Egypt. He will dispense money raised in America by the Armenian and Syrian Relief, and also that raised by American Sunday-schools. Already in Palestine thousands of families have been saved from starvation, and in Jerusalem many men and women have been furnished with employment. And the extensions of the British sections through recent victories will widen the opportunities for Mr. Trowbridge. Among those recently helped were a remnant of the ancient Samaritans.

Nothing could be more appropriate than that this work of mercy in the Holy Land should be undertaken by the World's Sunday School Association. It will give the children in every Sunday School throughout the land a new inspiration to feel that they are taking part in helping to restore to health and strength other children in and around the very places where Christ Himself was once an infant in arms.

This thought when properly presented to our Sunday School scholars will give us what is so often needed, the point of contact between them and what we are trying to teach them. Let a child once feel that his or her tiny contribution is going to help a little child in Bethlehem of Judea, and a new interest will at once be aroused in that sacred spot.

Here and There

FROM SECRETARY MADDOO'S LETTER TO THE CLERGY OF AMERICA.

"Our boys in the trenches of France are leading us to victory, and with the might of America behind them the doom of the Kaiser and all that he represents is sealed. Their service and sacrifice challenge our support to the utmost. Nothing will impede their progress but our failure to do our part at home as well as they are doing their part upon the gory battlefields of France. To support and sustain them the Treasury of the United States must be kept strong. Every patriot of America must practice every possible economy, save every possible dollar and buy as many Liberty Bonds as he can every time a Liberty Loan is offered to the country.

"The duty of every citizen is clear and the performance of that duty is certain if the message of the government is carried into every home. That message is now the imperative needs of the Treasury in order that our army may advance with undiminished strength and vigor."

Jerusalem has become a model city, thanks to the new water supply with which she has been provided by the British since General Allenby's entry. Before the war she had an unenviable reputation for dirty water and unswept streets. This aspect of things did not please one of the Zionists, who set about inquiring if there was nothing that could be done. He was told that a band of volunteers had been formed to act as scavengers. But at this point the unspeakable Turk stepped in, and an inquiry was received from the Pasha as to the amount he was to receive for having granted the concession.

Round the edges the crust of the Prussian pie is beginning to crumble. The Allies are forcing their way south from Archangel. Japanese and American troops are gradually coming through Siberia. The British marching north from Palestine have captured Damascus, and French troops have entered Beirut. Serbians, Greeks, French and English will soon reach the Austro-Hungarian border on Albania, Serbia and Bulgaria. While on the great Western Front one strategic center after another is falling into the hands of the entente forces, so that a grand collapse may come at any moment.

The best answer to the German plea for peace is a redoubled subscription to the Liberty Loan. This peace drive is chiefly directed as a counter-offense to our loan campaign. Let the Hun see that his efforts in this direction are doomed to a failure as complete and far more speedy than his military plans.

COMMUNION BY INTINCTION.

Mr. Editor: It is with a feeling of reluctance that I discuss in public print such a sacred rite as the administration of the Holy Communion, but the seriousness of the present epidemic of influenza has so forced it on my mind that I cannot refrain from calling the attention of the intelligent readers of your papers to certain facts which appear evident to members of the medical profession as well as to many lay people. I am further emboldened to bring this matter before your readers when I recall that the late Dr. Trudeau, of Saranac Lake, New York, also a Churchman, called attention in the New York Churchman only a few days ago to the danger lurking in the common communion cup, and the very great advantage afforded by the administration of this sacred rite by intinction, in which the wine is given by means of a wafer or other vehicle without individual contact with the cup.

My attention was attracted a few evenings ago when reading the last issue of the Southern Churchman to advice published therein from the State Board of Health of Virginia. Among other timely suggestions bearing on the spread of the present epidemic of influenza was printed in bold type, "Don't drink out of a common drinking cup." In this connection I might mention that some States have abolished by law the common drinking cup with the common towel. This warning from our health authorities is so sane and simple that it should hardly require a suggestion from such excellent authority as the Virginia Board of Health for us to appreciate its wisdom and govern ourselves accordingly.

The mouth, as every physician knows, is the constant habitat of countless numbers of organisms, some of which are virulent and capable of producing under favorable conditions very serious disease. While the epidemic of influenza now raging throughout the country is a very serious malady, yet its fatality is not so high as other diseases which have at their very beginning their chief seat in the nose or throat, notably measles, scarlet fever, diphtheria, tonsillitis, and other throat affections. There are other more chronic affections of the mouth and throat, such as tuberculosis, which merits our serious consideration in this connection.

Many of the acute infectious diseases are contagious from the nasal and mouth secretions from their very beginning even before the patients are aware of the presence of disease. It is likewise well known by members of my profession that young children in their early teens are peculiarly susceptible to many contagious diseases which places them in jeopardy when they trustingly come to the altar for spiritual nourishment.

I have a very intelligent physician friend, a Churchman, who tells me he would not think of permitting his daughter to go to communion, and as for himself he rarely goes. If partaking of this Holy Communion is so helpful as we have been taught by the Church, we should recognize this serious fact that there are many communicants who do not go to the altar for fear that they will infect others and there is likewise a goodly number who remain away lest they themselves should contract some dangerous and contagious disease. Furthermore, there are many of those who do go to communion who have a dread, not great perhaps, but yet sufficient to put them out of the mental attitude to receive the benefit which comes from this sacred rite. These facts I wish to emphasize to the clergy of our Church, for they can hardly be in a position to appreciate their importance.

I take it for granted that no intelligent person can think that Providence extends to us any special protection by virtue of the sacredness of the rite. When science has revealed to us the truth there is always danger if we do not heed it.

I shall not discuss the theological side of the question, if there be any, but I do know that Bishop Lawrence, of the Diocese of Massachusetts (and likewise other Bishops), has not only permitted the administration of communion by intinction in certain parishes, but has encouraged its adoption. Am sure I could refer to no higher authority than the distinguished and much beloved Bishop of Massachusetts. It is also well known that many other Protestant churches have abandoned the common drinking cup in the interest of health and safety.

Our Church has at times been criticised for a conservatism which under certain conditions we justly admire, but when this conservatism leads us in conflict with the teachings of science we have equal reason to condemn, and to wish that our Church might be a little more progressive.

In the medical profession, particularly in the department of surgery, we are at times confronted with a situation where conservatism carried to extreme places our patients in the greatest peril. Shall we as a Church allow traditions and customs to prevent us from acting as science teaches and as our judgment dictates?

In conclusion, I wish to state that my own church, one of the largest and most influential in North Carolina, has recently adopted at the wish of the congregation, as reflected through the duly elected vestry, the method of administering communion by intinction. We were blessed in having as our spiritual leader one who was greatly beloved by his people, and one who was willing to break away from time honored customs and traditions when such a change was for the spiritual and physical well-being of his flock. Our rector finds that the new method now in use is very reverential, and that many more now come to the altar for communion than did formerly. It might be well to mention, however, that an opportunity is offered for the relatively small number who desire to take communion by the usual method.

APPEAL FOR UNITED STATES MARINES IN CUBA.

Mr. Editor: There are some seven hundred United States Marines stationed in and around Santiago, Cuba, with whom, for the next six months, it will be my high privilege to live and work. These men stand much in need of all that the Church can do for them, both religiously and socially. In a foreign land, where there are no restrictions against the sale of liquor to men in the service, they are subjected to temptation which would not assail them in the camps at home, or in France. Part of our work will be to create new interests which will afford some protection against many pitfalls. We shall need a constant supply of papers, books, magazines, church papers, and records for the phonograph. I should like also to give every man a Christmas card, together with some little gift which will remind him of home. I appeal, therefore, to your many readers who are keenly interested in the welfare of our American boys to mail such articles regularly every week or month. They can be sent at the postal rate of four ounces for one cent, and may be addressed to me, care of the Royal Bank of Canada, Santiago, Cuba. If any are disposed to contribute to a modest fund to be expended by the chaplain for the benefit of the men, such contributions may be sent to the same address, and will be duly acknowledged.

E. CLOWES CHORLEY.

(Rector of St. Philip's in the Highlands, Garrison, N. Y.)

A MESSAGE FROM BISHOP TUTTLE.

There have been appointed in the Province of Washington a Special Committee, of which Bishop Thomson, of Southern Virginia, is chairman, and Dean Bartlett, of the Philadelphia Divinity School, secretary, on the Recruiting and Support of Candidates for the Ministry.

In connection with the appointment the following resolution was adopted by the Province, viz., "That the Committee should, through its secretary, ask the Presiding Bishop of the Church to make a special appeal to all Church workers, lay and clerical, among the forces of the United States, asking them to act, as far as possible, as recruiting agents for the ministry."

By enlistment or conscription our young men have been largely drafted into the military service of the country. Every one knows with what a fine spirit of alacrity they all have gathered to the colors. We are immensely proud of them. With them and among them have gone not a few of our young ministers and our candidates for Holy Orders, and our boys and young men who were thinking about becoming ministers. In consequence there is coming, or there has already come, a dearth in the supply of pastors for our churches and missionaries for our posts.

In our great war there is in the army and navy a cry, loud and persistent, for "officer," "officer." In the great war which the Church is bound to keep up and means to keep up against ignorance and selfishness and faithlessness and sin it is not strange that the same cry is uplifted for "officers," "officers."

We, beg, then, for help. Help, O pa-ents! In Spartan bravery of spirit, spite of the shrinking of the heart of flesh, you have sent forth your boys to stand by the flag and to stand for the country. Will you not, also, when fit times come encourage your boys to enlist for service and leadership under the Saviour's flag and for His kingdom?

Help, O pastors! You have guided and cheered and blessed the young men of your flock in their goings forth to France and Flanders, and you have been proud to fix their stars on your service flags. Now turn, also, to cheer and guide some boys or a boy of your flock to take up the work equally hard, though, thank God, unbloody, against the power of evil and for perishing souls.

Help, O American boys! The grown-ups hardly know how your heart swells and your blood tingles, each one, with the wish to throw yourselves into the war right now and do your bit, even though hard hits and cruel hurts should come. Ah, boys, in the ministry of the Church there are not wanting hard hits and some cruel hurts, but the Church wants you and needs you to be leaders there. I beg you come on.

Help, O soldiers and sailors and airmen! After you are discharged from this righteous war for truth and honor and justice and freedom, turn you one and another, I beg, into the ranks of the ministry and fight there under the Church's banner against sin, the world and the devil; and continue Christ's faithful soldiers and servants and officers each one unto your life's end.

O parents, pastors, boys, soldiers, may God mercifully have us all in His holy keeping, and raise up officers for His Church militant to meet her sore need!

Daniel S. Tuttle,
Presiding Bishop.

BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW.

The Brotherhood's Advance Program.

"The members of the Brotherhood accept special responsibility at this time to assist the Church in preparation for the return to their parishes of those men now enlisted in the service of the nation."

For thirty-five years the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has been faithfully following the guidance of the Master in the spread of Christ's Kingdom among men. As a result of the fidelity of men who have fought valiantly for the ideals of the Brotherhood, a foundation was laid for an immediate service for God and country at the outbreak of the war. The creating of the Army and Navy Department was alone made possible by this nationally organized lay work of the Church.

Working assiduously with the approval of the Church War Commission, this Department has established a new era in Brotherhood activities. When our country became an ally in the world war, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew immediately undertook to co-operate with the chaplains and other Clergy in organizing for the spread of Christ's Kingdom in the camps, at the same time assuring those who were serving the flag the sympathy, love and fellowship of the Church's army at home. Seventy-two laymen, chiefly members of the Brotherhood, have responded to the appeal for personal workers in the cantonment, and to-day there are thirty-two men serving for periods of three, six or twelve months, or for the life of the war. The records of the work these laymen have accomplished show achievements for the Master. Enlisted men in the camps have been enrolled in Bible Classes, Personal Workers' Groups and Corporate Communion units, the influence of which is being felt throughout the camps and is being mirrored in the hearts of men at home. These men of the Brotherhood are telling the men in the camps that when they return to their individual parishes they will find the Brotherhood of St. Andrew organized and extending them a welcome for practical and inspiring service in the Church.

The Army and Navy Department is financed by the War Commission of the Church. Our work in the army camps and naval stations is in co-operation with the Young Men's Christian Association. The Secretary in charge of the Religious Work Bureau of the Young Men's Christian Association clearly states the unique and tremendously important place which the Brotherhood of St. Andrew is filling at this very critical time. He says:

"Will you please state to the Executive Committee of your War Council that we, in the Religious Work Bureau, feel under great obligation to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for the fine work your members have been doing in different camps. They have not only been an inspiration to our Secretaries in their lives and service, but their emphasis upon personal evangelism has proved contagious to the Christian men in the camps. I wish that some time I could bring before the members of your Executive Committee at greater length the debt of gratitude we owe your Brotherhood."

The foregoing statement is evidence that there is no substitute for the Brotherhood idea; and the service the Brotherhood is rendering in the camps to satisfy the religious needs establishes beyond question its potential value and the sound principle of its operation.

A New Vision.

The work of the Army and Navy Department is a fulfillment of our ideals of personal Christian service among men and a demonstration of their unique and practical worth; but it is also a clear call to the other laymen of Christ's Church, the army at home. The vision is increasingly clear that our Commander-in-Chief, 'our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, desires us to mobilize for extended orders. And this preparing for peace in time of war calls for a consecration which few of us have experienced. Not only must it be a consecration to carry on, and to prepare in each parish for the home-coming of our fighting men, but for each individual it must be a consecration that necessitates a closer intimacy with our Lord and a new loyalty to His cause. To win, Christ's army must measure up to the same high standard attained by our country's army in gaining its objective. And this means the organization and training of groups of men and boys in every parish throughout the Church, who shall generate spiritual power through prayer and who shall use that power in personal service on behalf of the Kingdom.

God's call is to organize for the building of the superstructure on the foundation which He has given us. The call is personal; thank God, the answer is to be universal!

The Objectives.

With deep gratitude to God for the abundant blessings which we have received at His hands in these years of foundation building in the Brotherhood, and with a spirit of rejoicing for the privilege He has given us of obeying the command of His holy will, we shall, with the guidance of His Holy Spirit, further organize—

For the extension of Christ's Kingdom through the enlistment of men and boys of the Church in serving this high objective.

To create in every parish a service group of men and boys who will be of genuine value to the rector.

To make personal prayer and service a living factor in every parish.

To make practical the threefold endeavor in every parish; increasing church attendance, men's Bible classes, men's Corporate Communion.

To promote the devotional life of the family through the practice of family prayer.

To bring fathers, older brothers and kinsmen of enlisted men into practical and inspiring relationship to Christ's service.

To show young men with increasing clearness the vision of the sacred ministry, serving as officers in Christ's army.

To strengthen the Brotherhood's Junior Department by training and actively enlisting boys of every parish in Christ's army.

The Advance Program.

To realize these objectives, a definite plan for an advance program, to be operating by January 1, 1919, briefly includes the following:

To place in the field as rapidly as possible eight Secretaries, one for each Province. To re-organize Chapters depleted by reason of enlistment of membership in our nation's fighting forces, and to organize new groups to serve actively in Christ's army where no Chapters have recently existed. These Secretaries will intensify the work throughout the Dioceses and be under the supervision of a General Secretary. The plan likewise provides for a Junior Department Secretary, whose entire time will be devoted to the Church's supreme opportunity. The boy, bringing him into his proper relationship to the Church's army and so training him for Christian service that he shall "not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under His banner, against sin, the world, and the devil; and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end."

The National Council of the Brotherhood has enthusiastically adopted the advance program; and a committee of Churchmen, representatives of the various Provinces, is at work upon the financing of the undertaking. You are asked to share in the privilege of aiding the Church to prepare for the return of the men from the front and for the realization of the new vision.

We are face to face with a condition, not a theory. Many of our best men—all honor to them!—have entered the country's service, leaving vacancies in the Church's ranks and leadership. The Brotherhood of St. Andrew is the only national men's movement of the Church. Its sole object is the spread of Christ's Kingdom. Admitting human weaknesses, it has never failed the Church. It is to-day interpreting its object by the rules of prayer and service among enlisted men; and it is carrying on at home. It is pre-eminently qualified by experience, organization and ideal to serve the Church during this period of reconstruction. Your parish must choose whether it shall join with and support the Brotherhood in mobilizing the laymen of the Church at a crucial hour and for the highest service to which a Christian man may respond.

A need never existed for the fulfillment of Christ's program and the establishment of Christ's Kingdom that could not be satisfied. With the knowledge that God is calling us to a larger service, our hearts are strengthened as we rejoice in the hope of every man's enthusiasm.

A MESSENGER FROM AMERICA WITH THE FRENCH ARMY.

By Charles S. Macfarland, Commissioner to France of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

No experience of my life has been more deeply interesting or illuminating than the privilege I have had, as the guest of the French government and war office, of service on the front with the brave soldiers who have been defending the liberties of France and of the civilized world for four long years.

From Montdidier to Verdun and from Verdun to Belfort, in trenches front and rear, in rest camps, in fields and evacuation hospitals, in the Vosges mountains, in Alsace and in scores of assassinated cities and towns, it was a vivid story of suffering, cruelty, bravery and devotion. The marvel of it all has been to understand how these men, many of them physically frail, have held the line, against great odds, under constant and ever increasing discouraging experiences.

They have been almost entirely without many of the moral reinforcements, of an institutional nature, which have been the support of our American soldiers, but their national ideals have been by no means without religious sanction and power.

The French army has had hundreds of faithful chaplains, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, commissioned with the rank of captain by the War Department. They have secured the warm support of the commanding generals and the deep appreciation of the soldiers. They have gone a long way in changing the official attitude of France towards religion.

In addition to the regular army chaplains at the front there are many volunteer chaplains, consisting of soldiers who have been retired, now serving, without rank, at one and the same time both as pastors of churches and hospital chaplains.

Like our American forces, the French and allied armies have, in Marshal Foch a leader of deeply religious spirit and life. The evening I spent with him at supper at his headquarters, just as he was in the heat of his heaviest offensive, discussing the state of religion in France and America, is one of the treasured memories of my many striking experiences in France. Marshal Foch expressed the earnest faith that the allied nations were following the ideals left to the world by Jesus, in unavoidable conflict with a perverted religious spirit utterly opposed to Christian ideals. Simple, unaffected, gentle and peaceful in spirit, quiet and gracious in manner, Foch is the most absolute contrast to Hindenburg or Ludendorff that could be imagined, a contrast which strikingly symbolizes the totality of difference between the spirit and method of the allied peoples and Germany.

Marshal Joffre, in a very happy interview, commenting on the messages of the Federal Council to the French people and the French army, expressed the judgment that the moral and spiritual support from America was as essential and significant and potent as her millions of men and money.

I presented the Federal Council message to the French army to about ten French generals commanding different armies and divisions, and to many commandants at various headquarters, and it was always received in a devout spirit and with a response which revealed a deep appreciation of its meaning.

The message from our churches was also received by M. Clemenceau with words of deep appreciation.

Chaplain Monod, who accompanied me, was received by the commanding generals with a spirit which clearly expressed their recognition of his representation of spiritual institutions and forces.

Every service that we held was attended by the generals in the district and their staffs. The service, underground, in the citadel of Verdun, was attended by two generals with their staffs, who had come from forty miles distant, a multitude of officers and soldiers and by many Protestant chaplains who had been brought together by the general commanding the Second French army. And after the Protestant service, he took me to another hall of the citadel where he had gathered a large group of Roman Catholic and Hebrew chaplains to greet me. Religious services of a military nature were held at Chaumont, Verdun, Nancy, Wesseling and Thann, the latter town being in reconquered Alsace, and under bombardment at the time.

All along the front, had it been a Secretary of War he could not have received more formal or gracious attention, than did a simple missionary of American Christians with a French Protestant chaplain.

The French Army Y. M. C. A., the Foyer du Soldat, has secured the confidence and support of the French military authorities, both at the Department of War and in the field, and has found warm appreciation with the soldiers. Underground at Fort Douaumont, high up on the Vosges Mountains at Hohneck, down in the little villages where the soldiers are billeted, and near the front line trenches in the Vosges, we found these cheerful, comfortable huts, with the French Protestants and sometimes the American Y. M. C. A. workers, faithfully pouring out hot chocolate for the men, with surroundings of moral influence and though without formal religious ceremonies, breathing a truly religious spirit.

Is there a spirit of religion in the French army? Anyone present at the impressive service at Verdun would have heard a reassuring answer as he looked over that wonderful congregation while the prayers were uttered with such power by the Protestant chaplain of desolated Verdun.

Services in the cities and towns under bombardment were attended, with devout participation, by mayors and councils and always by the military authorities.

I had wondered how much it meant when the French War Office invited me, as a representative of Protestant churches, to visit the army as its guest—how much it meant as a recognition of religion. My experience at the front convinced me that it was a genuine acknowledgment of the place of religion in a war for ideals and that neither the French army, nor the French people, nor indeed the French government were without the sense and spirit of religion. As Marshal Foch said to me as I left him to return to his maps and plans, within the sound of the roar of the guns not far away, "We cannot maintain the ideals of liberty and justice, whether in war or in peace, without faith in Christ, for He was the great giver of freedom to men."

The manhood of France, which during these momentous years, has so patiently, bravely and devoutly, awaited the victory of great ideals, whose vision and faith are now finding justification and fulfillment, has not endured and suffered with hearts unsupported by religion.

Soon they will be returning to the new France which they have saved and, if the Church can only interpret and express their faith, they will be brought into her life, to find, as Marshal Foch put it, that faith in Christ which is the same yesterday, to-day and forever, in peace as in war.

SPANISH INFLUENZA.

From the U. S. Public Health Service.

The disease now occurring in this country and called "Spanish influenza" resembles a very contagious kind of "cold" accompanied by fever, pains in the head, eyes, ears, back or other parts of the body and a feeling of severe sickness. In most of the cases the symptoms disappear after three or four days, the patient then rapidly recovering; some of the patients, however, develop pneumonia, or inflammation of the ear, or meningitis.

In most cases a person taken sick with influenza feels sick rather suddenly. He feels weak, has pains in the eyes, ears, head or back and may be sore all over. Many patients feel dizzy, some vomit. Most of the patients complain of feeling chilly and with this comes a fever in which the temperature rises to 100 to 104. In most cases the pulse remains relatively slow.

In appearance one is struck by the fact that the patient looks sick. His eyes and the inner side of his eyelids may be slightly "bloodshot," or "congested," as the doctors say. There may be running from the nose, or there may be some cough. These signs of a cold may not be marked; nevertheless the patient looks and feels very sick.

Ordinarily, the fever lasts from three to four days and the patient recovers. But while the proportion of deaths in the present epidemic has generally been low, in some places the outbreak has been severe and deaths have been numerous. When death occurs it is usually the result of a complication.

It is now believed that influenza is always spread from person to person, the germs being carried with the air along with the very small droplets of mucus, expelled by coughing or sneezing, forceful talking, and the like by one who already has the germs of the disease. They may also be carried about in the air in the form of dust coming from dried mucus, from coughing and sneezing, or from careless people who spit on the floor and on the sidewalk. As in most other catching diseases, a person who has only a mild attack of the disease himself may give a very severe attack to others.

It is very important that every person who becomes sick with influenza should go home at once and go to bed.

This will help keep away dangerous complications and will, at the same time, keep the patient from scattering the disease far and wide. It is highly desirable that no one be allowed to sleep in the same room with the patient. In fact, no one but the nurse should be allowed in the room.

If there is cough and sputum or running of the eyes and nose, care should be taken that all such discharges are collected on bits of gauze or rag or paper napkins and burned. If the patient complains of fever and headache, he should be given water to drink, a cold compress to the forehead, and a light sponge. Only such medicine should be given as is prescribed by the doctor. It is foolish to ask the druggist to prescribe and may be dangerous to take the so-called "safe, sure and harmless" remedies advertised by patent-medicine manufacturers.

If the patient is so situated that he can be attended only by some one who must also look after others in the family, it is advisable that such attendant wear a wrapper, apron, or gown over the ordinary house clothes while in the sick room, and slip this off when leaving to look after the others.

Nurses and attendants will do well to guard against breathing in dangerous disease germs by wearing a simple fold of gauze or mask while near the patient.

In guarding against disease of all kinds, it is important that the body be kept strong and able to fight off disease germs. This can be done by having a proper proportion of work, play and rest, by keeping the body well clothed, and by eating sufficient, wholesome, and properly selected food. In connection with diet, it is well to remember that milk is one of the best all-around foods obtainable for adults as well as children.

Where crowding is unavoidable, as in street cars, care should be taken to keep the face so turned as not to inhale directly the air breathed out by another person.

It is especially important to beware of the person who coughs or sneezes without covering his mouth and nose. It also follows that one should keep out of crowds and stuffy places as much as possible, keep homes, offices and workshops well aired, spend some time out of doors each day, walk to work if at all practicable—in short, make every possible effort to breathe as much pure air as possible.

"Until He Find."

St. Luke 15:4.

O tender Shepherd, climbing rugged mountains,
And wading waters deep,
How long wouldst Thou be willing to go homeless
To find a straying sheep?

"I count no time," the Shepherd gently answered,
"As thou dost count, and bind
The days in weeks, the weeks in months;
My counting is just—until I find."

"And that would be the limit of My journey.
I'd cross the waters deep,
And climb the hillsides with unfailing patience,
Until I found my sheep."

Church Intelligence

Meeting of the Board of Missions.

Twenty-three members were present at the meeting of the Board of Missions on October 2, 1918. It was found that several of the members were in war work; Bishop Perry and Dr. Stires in France, and Dr. Freeman in this country.

The President welcomed the new Domestic Secretary, the Rev. Francis S. White. Mr. White begins his work as a result of the request of most of the Domestic Missionary Bishops. This is the opening of a most important department.

The President also welcomed two new members on the Board: The Rt. Rev. John N. McCormick, D. D., of Western Michigan, in place of the Bishop of Marquette, resigned, and Mr. Mortimer Matthews, of Cincinnati, Ohio, in place of Mr. Stirling, deceased, both representatives of the Province of the Midwest.

Dr. John W. Wood, Foreign Secretary, was not present at this meeting of the Board, owing to his visit to the distant missions of the Church. This visit is made at the urgent request of the Bishops in the Orient, and is most important at this time.

The President introduced the Rev. Canon Smart, of Heart's Content, Newfoundland. Canon Smart was visiting the Board to bear the greetings of the Bishop, Clergy and members of the Church of England in Newfoundland. In July, at the request of the Bishop and Clergy, a representative of the Board of Missions visited the Biennial Synod of the Church of England in Newfoundland, and was received with great hospitality. Canon Smart, in addressing the Board, spoke of the progress toward self-support in Newfoundland, having cut down their appropriations from the S. P. G. from five thousand pounds in thirty years to less than two hundred pounds this year. By 1919 the Diocese of Newfoundland will be entirely self-supporting. What impressed the members of the Board greatly was the amount of the first Sunday-school offering at the time of the Synod meeting, when the children gave $3,100 for the support of missionary work in the English Diocese of Shangtung, China.

Two of our Bishops in the Orient have lately celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their consecration as Missionary Bishops. One was Bishop Graves, of Shanghai, and the other Bishop McKim, of Tokyo. The Board adopted resolutions of congratulation and appreciation for their long and faithful service.

It was reported to the Board that the Missionary District of Western Colorado was the first Missionary District to complete its apportionment for the present year, and, in fact, it had been overpaid. It was also noted that the District of North Dakota had asked for an increase in its apportionment from $2,000 to $2,500.

The Apportionment Committee reported, recommending an apportionment of $1,590,000 for the year 1919, to be distributed to the various Dioceses and Missionary Districts, on the same basis as heretofore.

The Fort Valley Negro School in Fort Valley, Ga., having become a Church school and the Diocese of Atlanta and the American Church Institute for Negroes, each having appropriated $2,000 a year toward the running expenses, the Board granted an appropriation of $6,000 also for this purpose, in accordance with the previous agreement.

The Treasurer reported that the receipts to September 25th were $11,793 less than last year. Gifts on account of the One Day's Income Plan to September 1 amounted to $94,240.

Several vacancies in the lay membership of the Board were noted, but the election of new members was laid over until a later meeting.

Meeting of the Executive Committee.

The first meeting of the Executive Committee after the summer vacation was held on October 1, 1918.

Among the important things done in the domestic field was the continuance of the appropriation from the Elizabeth S. Fowler Fund toward the education and support of eight daughters of deceased clergymen who have, at one time, been missionaries of this Church.

An appropriation of $1,547 was made for Utah, to aid the Acting Bishop to pay necessary expenses connected with Rowland Hall and St. Mark's Hospital.

Provision was made to clear off the debt on the Chapel of the Redeemer and King Hall, Oklahoma, which has been worrying the Bishop for a long while.

A loan of $10,000 was made to the District of Salina from the $100,000 Loan Fund created by the Board from undesignated legacies, to enable the Bishop to purchase a piece of property next to the Cathedral.

In the Latin American field, an appropriation of $700 was made in order to keep Hooker School open for the balance of the year.

Mr. Thomas J. Ash, a lay worker, was employed at La Romana, in Santo Domingo, to carry on a work there which is giving great promise.

In the foreign field, Miss Virginia Thomas was appointed to go to Point Hope, Alaska. The Rev. A. E. Butcher was transferred from Alaska to the Hawaiian Islands, and the Rev. J. Lamb Doty and Miss Laura L. Baugh were employed in the missionary work of the Hawaiian Islands.

In Japan, an appropriation was made to provide for the publication of literature in the vernacular, a great need for which has been felt.

Dr. Rudolph B. Teusler, head of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, has been appointed head of the Red Cross unit in Siberia. He was granted indefinite leave of absence so that he might take up this work. Eleven of our men from China and Japan, including the Bishop of Kyoto, are now engaged in war work.

The resignation of the Rev. R. A. Walke was accepted from the District of Kyoto.

In China, an appropriation was made to provide medical work at Kuling, District of Anking.

Two very important subjects in China were considered, but action was deferred pending further conference with the Bishops in the Orient. One was concerning the relocation of many of our mission buildings in the District of Hankow, to provide for expansion of the work and increase in its efficiency. The other was the proposed amalgamation of St. Luke's and St. Elizabeth's Hospitals.

Miss R. G. Pumphrey was transferred from the District of Alaska to the District of Shanghai.

The Rev. John Magee, of Nanking, District of Shanghai, was given permission to appeal in Pittsburgh, for specials amounting to $20,000 for the development of a very important work among young men in Hsiakwan.

Correspondence With the Council of the Russian Church.

In August, 1917, the Rt. Rev. Dr. Anderson, President of the World Conference Commission of the American Episcopal Church, cabled greetings to the Council of the Holy Orthodox Church of Russia, sitting for the first time for centuries as a free and democratic Church. At that Council, Tikhon, formerly the Russian Archbishop in New York, was elected Patriarch of All the Russians, and sent the following reply:

To His Eminence, Right Rev. C. P. Anderson, Bishop of Chicago, President of the World Conference Commission of the American Episcopal Church,

Dear and Right Reverend Sir:

On behalf of the Council of the Holy Orthodox Church of Russia we beg to express once more our gratitude to the World Conference Commission presided over by you for its friendly greetings that were presented through Mr. Charles R. Crane on the opening day of Russian Church Council's sessions in Moscow, August 28, and received here with deep appreciation and unanimous vote of thanks.

May the Holy Spirit lead all Christendom to the final victory of the Cross and Gospel and to the Kingdom of Love over spiritual darkness and hatred that nowadays—as never before—attempt to hurt and destroy the precious work of our Saviour. Let all Christians unite in earnest prayers for Russian Church in her struggles against the enemies of Christ and religion!

As soon as the results of sessions of the Council of the Holy Orthodox Church of Russia are systematized we will feel our pleasure to communicate them to your friendliness and to the sympathy of the American Episcopal Church.

Please accept our best wishes to the coming day of the blessed Christmas and kindly convey the same to the World Conference Commission, to Mr. R. H. Gardiner and to our good friends—the American Episcopal Church.

Our blessings to all!
(Cross) Tikhon, Patriarch of All the Russians,

Chairman of the Council of the Holy Orthodox Russian Church.

V. Beneshevich, Secretary.

To this letter Bishop Anderson replied as follows:

The Most Rev. Tikhon, Patriarch of All the Russians, Chairman of the Council of the Holy Orthodox Russian Church, Moscow, Russia,

Your Holiness:

The kind letter which your Holiness sent to me, and through me to the World Conference Commission of the American Episcopal Church, in acknowledgment of our greetings to the Council of the Holy Orthodox Church of Russia, has been received with deep gratitude and affection. Owing, however, to the vicissitudes and difficulties of travel, the letter did not reach me until the month of April. It was read at a meeting of our Commission in New York in April, and immediately upon its reading the Commission joined in earnest prayer for your Holiness and for the Church and people of Russia. We associated ourselves with your Church and people and prayed that God would deliver us from our common enemies and from the enemies of Christ and religion, and that He would draw us together into a united allegiance to Christ and His Church and the welfare of the world.

The American Episcopal Church, as your Holiness well knows, has an abiding affection and admiration for the Russian Church, and especially in these days of common peril; and the American people long to join hands with the great Russian people in the fierce struggle for liberty and right that is going on in the world to-day.

With assurances of the profoundest interest in the performance of the great tasks which have fallen upon your Holiness in your exalted position, and with the further assurance of our constant sympathy and prayers, I am, on behalf of the World Conference Commission of the American Episcopal Church,

Yours sincerely and faithfully,
C. P. Anderson,
President of the Commission.

The Episcopal Commission had hoped to send a deputation to attend the Council and invite the co-operation of the Russian Church in the World Conference, having been assured by many eminent Russians that the invitation would be cordially accepted. That deputation will be sent as soon as conditions permit.

American Church Building Fund Commission.

At its meeting on September 19, held at the Church Missions House, New York City, loans amounting to $47,500 were voted to the following parishes and missions: Church of the Good Shepherd, Athens, Ohio; St. Paul's Church, Key West, Florida; Ascension Parish House, Denver, Colorado; Grace Church Rectory, Muskogee, Oklahoma; St. John's Church, Bowling Green, Ohio; St. Luke's Church, Cedar Falls, Iowa; Church of the Redeemer Parish House, Cairo, Illinois; St. Matthew's Parish House, Dallas, Texas; St. Andrew's Parish House, Mayaguez, Porto Rico; St. Matthew's Rectory, Spokane, Washington; St. Ambrose's Rectory, Groton, New York, and St. Andrew's Rectory, Emporia, Kansas. Gifts amounting to $6,800 were voted to the following parishes and missions: Christ Church, Osaka, Japan; Mission Church, Tsuruga, Japan; Calvary Mission Rectory, Seaside, Oregon; St. Mark's Rectory, Hood River, Oregon; St. Barnabas' Church, Bemidji, Minnesota; St. George's Church, Cordova, Alaska; Emmanuel Church, Boyce, Virginia; Calvary Church, Rosebud Mission, South Dakota; Grace Church, Céspedes, Cuba; St. Luke's Church, Mabton, Washington; Christ Church Rectory, Anvik, Alaska; St. Stephen's Rectory, Fort Yukon, Alaska; Mission Rectory, Nanling, China; Mission Church, Sakai, Japan, and Mission Church, Tanabe, Japan. Grants amounting to $3,300 were voted to the following parishes and missions: St. John's Rectory, Auburn, New York; Grace Church Rectory, Riverside, Pennsylvania; Emmanuel Church Parish House, Shawnee, Oklahoma, and St. Paul's Church Rectory, Waxahachie, Texas.

Recent Visitations of Bishop Dunn of Honduras.

On his way home from Panama and Costa Rica, Bishop Dunn, of British Honduras, arrived at New Orleans on St. Matthew's Day. He preached in St. Paul's Church on Sunday, September 22, and went to Mobile to meet his brother, the Rev. Harold Dunn, and his family from Quebec, who will return with him to Belize to take up work in the Diocese. Of the three hundred and fifty candidates confirmed on this trip, nearly half were for the American Church in the Canal Zone. In one day in Costa Rica he held four confirmations at widely separated points, confirming sixty-two, varying in age from fourteen to seventy, travelling one hundred and twenty-five miles by motor car on the railway, all in less than twelve hours. This work and one confirmation the day before, were all in charge of a most earnest priest, who continually moves up and down the railway. In two months the Bishop travelled fifty-five hundred miles, thirty-two hundred of which could have been avoided if he had a boat of his own. Lack of reliable communication prevented him from visiting Nicaragua at this time, so that another very long trip to that republic will soon be necessary. Chaplain Carson, in charge of the work in the Canal Zone, suggested that the offerings at that time be given to start a boat fund to provide for so vital a need. It is hoped that gifts for this fund will now be forthcoming in abundance.

Church Workers Among Colored People.

The thirty-fourth Annual Conference of Church Workers Among Colored People will be held at St. Augustine's Normal and Collegiate Institute, Raleigh, N. C., October 15-18. An attractive and very practical program has been prepared. On Friday, October 18, will take place the consecration of the Rev. Henry B. Delaney, as Suffragan Bishop of the Diocese of North Carolina for the colored people, Bishop Cheshire presiding. Bishops Bratton and Darst co-consecrators, Bishops Weed and Leonard presenters, and Bishop Lloyd preacher. Persons expecting to attend the Conference will notify the Rev. James K. Satterwhite, P. O. Box 221, Raleigh, N. C.

The American Seamen's Friend Society, 76 Wall Street, New York, which conducts work for sailors on an international basis, announces the appointment of Thomas McIntyre as ship visitor and assistant to the chaplain of its Sailors' Home and Institute on the North River water front, New York.

Mr. McIntyre has been for several years a Baptist minister and is a graduate of Mount Hermon School and Brown University. He is now enrolled for studies at Union Theological Seminary.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Religious Section of the State Council of Defense, of which Bishop Gibson is Chairman, met on October 7 in the court rooms of the Corporation Commission, Richmond. Besides its members, Colonel Kelley, Secretary of the State Council of Defense, was present. The object of the religious section of this Council is to bring the religious forces of the State to bear upon the winning of the war by diffusing information and invoking a spirit of patriotism. The Episcopal Church is regarded as among the foremost Church agencies for doing this much needed work among the people of the State. The meetings of this section are most harmonious and agreeable to its members. The Council is commissioned by the Governor and its action within its province is authoritative.

Convocation: Members who expect to attend the Piedmont Convocation, which meets in Bromfield Parish, Rappahannock County, October 14-16, will please notify the Rev. W. G. Pendleton, Warrenton, Va., that he may inform them when and where to arrive for conveyance by motor into Rappahannock County.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

Northwestern Convocation: The autumn meeting of this Convocation was held in St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, on Wednesday and Thursday, September 25 and 26. The Wheeling Clericus was entertained by the rector of St. Matthew's Church, the Rev. E. Lee Strider, on the Tuesday previous, and in the evening the first service of the Convocation was held when Archdeacon W. P. Chrisman preached.

Wednesday's session began with celebration of Holy Communion, the Dean, the Rev. Dudley Boogher, celebrant. This service was followed by a business session of the Convocation. The Treasurer's report showed a very satisfactory balance on hand, and it was ultimately decided to send the Treasurer of the Sheltering Arms Hospital a check for twenty-five dollars to aid in the purchase of linen, etc., much needed by this most deserving institution at present.

A letter from Rev. P. N. Macdonald, rector of Trinity Church, Morgantown, was read, stating that he had successfully passed the examination qualifying for a chaplaincy in the United States Army service, and that he was one of the number selected for overseas service. The Secretary was instructed to send a suitable reply to Mr. Macdonald's letter.

Archdeacon Spurr, of Reynold's Memorial Hospital who at the previous meeting of Convocation was appointed essayist, gave a very interesting and impressive account of prison work and his experiences in the same. This was followed by a discussion, in which most of the members took part.

The Rev. James L. Fish, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Wheeling, read a letter from the General Board of Religious Education urging the carrying out of a Sunday-school Teachers' Training Campaign throughout the Diocese. This called forth much discussion, principally as to the best method of teaching in Sunday-school.

On Thursday morning Bishop Gravatt, who had been delayed in his journey to Convocation, was present at the session, which had been called for nine o'clock. The morning was taken up with the consideration of the work of the Diocese, particularly the fact that a number of churches are without rectors. The missions at Cameron and Chester were especially considered, and arrangements made whereby they may have occasional services.

Lunch was served each day in the lecture room of the church. The Convocation was much enjoyed by all present.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thompson, D. D., Suffragan.

An interesting and detailed report has come in from Mrs. H. N. Castle, General Custodian, United Offering of the Diocese of Southern Virginia. We regret the report is too long to publish in full, but feel sure that readers will be interested in the following summary of contributions:

October, 1916-17$2,000.43
To March, 1918 1,000.00
To September, 1918 451.23

It may be noticed that the contributions from March to September, 1918, are very much less than they should be, and Mrs. Castle attributes this to the fact that her assistant, Mrs. Barksdale, was absent during the summer and that she herself has been ill, which may have caused a misunderstanding as to whom checks should be sent. Hereafter all contributions should be mailed to Mrs. H. N. Castle, 308 West Freemason Street, Norfolk, Va.

She closes her communication with this stirring appeal, "Of course, we all want to do better than last year, and so we will raise $1,000 at least, and as this is the age of millions and billions, let each branch send something, and as much as you possibly can from each individual. We all have so much for which to thank God."

The Central Convocation will meet in St. Luke's Church, Clover, Va., October 22 to 24, inclusive, with a preparatory service on Monday, the 21. Among the unusual features of a most interesting program, will be the ordination to the priesthood of the Rev. J. A. Figg, the minister in charge of the church at Clover and other points, and an address on some phase of pastoral theology at one of the informal conferences for the Clergy by the Rev. Joseph B. Dunn, D. D., of Lynchburg, author of "In the Service of the King." On Tuesday afternoon the conference will be devoted to a discussion of books, old and new, which have been found helpful to the members of Convocation. Both of the Bishops of the Diocese have promised to be present for at least a part of the time, and the personal contact between Bishops and Clergy is by no means the least attractive feature of the semi-annual meetings of this Convocation. On all three days luncheon will be served by the ladies of Clover and vicinity on the rectory lawn or, if the weather does not permit, in the rectory rooms.

The opening of the twenty-sixth session at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, finds about the usual proportion of new and old students on the campus. But at this as at practically all institutions there have been more than the usual number of changes in the faculty.

ARKANSAS.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan.

Consecration of Negro Bishop-Suffragan.

The consecration of the Rev. Edward Thomas Demby as Suffragan-Bishop of Arkansas, the first of the negro race to be elevated to this office in the American Church, took place in All Saints Church (colored), St. Louis, Mo., on Sunday, September 29. Bishop Tuttle was the consecrator, assisted by Bishop Winchester of Arkansas and Bishop Coadjutor Johnson of Missouri. Bishop Wise of Kansas and Bishop Saphore, Suffragan-Bishop of Arkansas, were the presenters. The sermon was preached by Bishop Gaffor on "Christian Leadership." It was a clear discussion of the condition and needs of the American negroes and the qualities necessary for true leadership among them. The service was dignified and impressive, and a large congregation of white and colored people were present.

ERIE.

Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., Bishop.

Letter From Bishop Israel.

The Dean at Erie has received the following letter from Bishop Israel:

August 27, 1918.

Bishop Israel, Chaplain Base Hospital 20, A. E. F., France.

My Dear Dean: Your letters of May 18 and two of July 5, together with check for fifty-six francs from the "Women's Friendly Society of St. Paul's Cathedral," were all received in the very midst of my work here at the hospital, which I find both absolutely absorbing and most exacting. Were it not for the kindness of a young American friend who is spending the summer at this lovely spot I would not be able to be writing this letter to you today. Our hospital unit has some thirty-one buildings, mostly large and small hotels, under its control and in use for hospital purposes. We are ministering to about three times the number of wounded we were expected to accommodate. The demand upon the time of our surgeons and physicians is without limit, and the same conditions extend to the chaplain. With hundreds of wounded men, some desperately hurt, mostly from the front, looking for me to be at their bedsides daily and frequently at night, my correspondence has simply had to be given up. What I am doing is entirely to the credit of the above friend. The money has been exceptionally helpful. I have spent it for fruit (oranges, peaches, grapes and pears), which some of the most seriously wounded crave incessantly. If the contributors could only have seen the smiles and satisfaction of those receiving fruit provided by their generous offerings their hearts would have been filled both with gratitude that they were able to minister in this way and with sadness at how little it takes to make happy men suffering as so many of these are. I am more and more impressed with the fact that our soldiers, especially the wounded, have reverted to many childhood thoughts and ways. The wounded are the bravest, most patient and most unselfish set of men I have ever met, grateful for the very least service you render and always ready to offer their services to a comrade more seriously hurt than they.

Your friend and Bishop,
(Signed) ROGERS ISRAEL.

The Inter-Diocesan Summer School at Conneaut Lake, under the joint direction of the Boards of Religious Education of the Dioceses of Pittsburgh, Erie, Ohio, and the Province of Washington, was a great success; and had the largest enrollment of teachers since its foundation. The Diocesan Board has conceived an excellent plan in following up this Summer School Work and arousing more enthusiasm by holding Church School Institutes in four sections of the Diocese at the beginning of the autumn season: Sharon, September 16; Erie, 17; Franklin, 18; Bradford, 20. Mrs. John Loman, of Philadelphia, a member of the G. B. R. E., who had been such an inspiration at the Summer School, kindly consented to lead these institutes. Her addresses and conferences on the Christian Nurture Series were most helpful and illuminating. Through her efforts more parishes have adopted the Series than ever before.

The Annual Convocation of the Archdeaconry of Ridgeway met in the parish of St. Luke's, Southport, the Rev. W. E. Van Dyke, the rector, now in France in Y. M. C. A. work. The vicar in charge being the Rev. E. H. Edson. The sessions began with Evensong, at which the Rev. Dr. Aigue, President of Standing Committee, preached. At the conclusion of the service an informal reception of the Clergy and people was held in the Parish House. The following morning, after a celebration of the Holy Communion by Archdeacon Radcliffe, the Rev. Dr. Agate and the vicar of the parish, Morning Prayer was read, followed by the business session, the following officers being elected: Secretary, the Rev. W. R. Agate, M. D.; Treasurer, Rev. W. Mitchell, Esq.; Executive Mission Board, the Rev. E. H. Edson, Hon. Josiah Howard and W. W. Lenslow. The Archdeacon is elected every three years. After the elections, the Rev. Dr. Aigner reported for the Diocese; Archdeacon Radcliffe for the Archdeaconry, and the Clergy present concerning their different fields of labor. At noon the Archdeacon called all present to prayer for missions. A delightful lunch in the Parish House was served by the ladies of the parish. In the afternoon a number of addresses were made upon Sunday-school work, especially "The Nurture" Series, the leaders of the discussion being the Rev. Drs. Overs and Aigner. A number of the Clergy took part in the discussion. The sessions concluded with a patriotic service in the evening with a well filled church. Eloquent addresses were delivered by the Rev. Messrs. Jenkin Watkins, W. H. Overs, Ph. D., A. C. Jones, Ph. D., and James A. Baynton. These gentlemen were introduced by the Archdeacon, who also gave the final blessing. The Archdeacon was asked to write to Bishop Israel, the Rev. W. E. Van Dyke and Chaplain W. H. Jones, who are all somewhere in France.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Frederick C. Musser has been ordered to camp for the purpose of taking the course of instruction, preparatory to entering upon his work as chaplain in the United States military forces. He left on October 2, and his place in St. Paul's, Bloomsburg, will be supplied for the next six weeks by the Rev. John A. Carr, of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Willoughby M. Parchment, who has charge of work among the colored people of the Diocese, has begun a most interesting work in the camp at Marsh Run near Harrisburg. In this camp there are a large number of colored men, nearly if not quite all from the State of Georgia. On Sunday afternoon, September 29, almost two hundred and fifty assembled in the large mess hall for a service. By special arrangement the Bishop was present and also the Rev. Messrs. Post and Baker. A cabinet organ has been provided through the thoughtfulness of the Bishop and the Rev. Dr. Appleton, of St. Paul's Church, Harrisburg, has supplied a hundred Mission Hymns for the use of these men. The hymns were sung with a vigor and volume that were inspiring. Bishop Darlington and the Rev. Leroy F. Baker made addresses which were listened to with great interest.

Among these men are college graduates. The organist on the occasion,

UNIFORM DIVORCE LAW.

Last Friday's papers contained a dispatch from Washington in which every Church paper and every clergyman should take the keenest interest, and to which should be given the utmost prominence.

This news item tells us of the first step towards a national divorce law and says:

"The adoption of a constitutional amendment which will enable Congress to pass a national divorce law is being urged upon members of Congress by a delegation of distinguished clergymen who have come to Washington for that purpose. At the head of the delegation is the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, rector of New York's Trinity Church, now a chaplain in the army.

"Dr. Manning filed with the Judiciary Committee of the House a memorial signed by a large number of clergymen, lawyers and educators of New York, Boston, New Haven and other cities. Among the signers are Monsignor Lavelle, vicar-general of the Diocese of New York, and Bishop Hughes, of the Methodist Church, who resides in Malden, Mass. The memorial prays for the enactment of the measure now pending before the committee which would permit Congress 'to establish and enforce, by appropriate legislation uniform laws as to marriage and divorce.'

"Dr. Manning urged that with the passage of a national law, limiting the number of cases upon which divorces might be granted, there will come uniformity among the States and the present scandal of easy divorce for trivial cause will be ended. He told the committee that the United States has a larger proportion of divorces to the population than any other civilized country in the world with the single exception of Japan."

Many people believe and rightly so that this is one of the largest questions before the Christian and civilized world to-day, and churches should get behind this move with all the power and influence they possess and should keep it before the public until definite action is taken.

The amendment of the Federal Constitution is always a slow process and takes persistent agitation to bring about its accomplishment, therefore, Church leaders should prepare for a long fight and not neglect any occasion for reminding the public of the importance of this issue to our religious and social well being.

"IDEALISM STILL LIVES.

News comes through a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church that even in isolated parts of India the natives are familiar with many of President Wilson's clear cut statements of national and international righteousness.

Rev. Benson Baker, Superintendent of the Missions in the Milrut district, tells us that:

"In a recent journey through an isolated part of the country Mr. Baker discovered that people in the farthest villages are talking of the United States and President Wilson. Quotations from the President's statements have spread almost entirely by word of mouth, only an infinitesimal proportion of the people being able to read.

"In the minds of the people of India, America stands out as a great ideal nation," Mr. Baker reported. "Her entrance into the war convinced them that the cause was righteous. As soon as the men of the villages find out that ours is the American mission they begin eagerly to ask questions about the country across the seas. Somehow these people have heard extracts of what President Wilson has said, and it has gripped their hearts as nothing else has done since the war began."

Almost simultaneously, Stephen Panarettoff, Bulgarian Minister to the United States, makes the statement that he considers "the President's ideas as great a power in bringing about the defeat of the Central Powers as force of arms." Thus we have evidence from two widely different sources that the power of the idealist has not lost its grip upon humanity.

These reports are merely straws showing the formation of a world-wide sentiment in favor of justice and equity.

Let us hope that this sentiment will grow and crystallize into a definite demand for that League of Nations which the President has now stated must be a part of the final settlement, and which will be conclusive element in bringing about permanent peace on earth, good will towards men.

THE NEW ERA MOVEMENT.

The example of the government in raising huge sums of money is now being followed by the Presbyterian Church, which has adopted a plan under the name of the title of this article to raise $75,000,000.

We are told in an article on this subject in the New York Evening Times that:

"The New Era Movement was perfected in its details last week. It is proposed to assist every Presbyterian church in the nation to prepare itself for a new type of community service with special reference to the families from which boys have gone to the front and also to the needs of the returning soldiers and sailors. It is an Americanization plan in every sense of the word, involving methods of education for foreigners."

Dr. William Howard Folkes, General Secretary of the Movement, in discussing it, spoke as follows:

"We are opening a campaign which will co-ordinate all the agencies of our Church under the principles of allied strategy, and we hope to be able to lead every local church to accept its full share of its national responsibility. The Church itself must be made strong and must take its place as one of the constructive factors in the molding of the life of the world. Presbyterianism does not intend to capitalize the present hour for any sectarian advantage, but desires to do its utmost that the great principles for which our boys are fighting may be made real at home and abroad."

In view of the fact that heretofore the Presbyterian Church has never attempted to raise a larger sum than $6,000,000, it will be appreciated what an inspiration the opportunities of past an inspiration the opportunities of post-war conditions has brought to our Presbyterian brethren.

It is planned to take five years for the raising of this tremendous sum.

MOLDING PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

We must not think for a moment that because the country is to go on a bone dry basis after July first next that the victory for prohibition is completely won.

No law is effective, not even a Federal law, unless it has public sentiment behind it.

Heretofore the fight against the liquor traffic has been entirely destructive. It has now entered upon a stage where it must become constructive. There are many towns and cities where the saloon has flourished not so much on account of the refreshment it dispensed as because of the good fellowship and social center which it afforded.

In order to make men satisfied without the saloon, something of this nature must be supplied by those who wish to see the permanent destruction of the use of alcoholic liquors. The establishment of men's clubs, including healthful and interesting means of recreation in such localities, offers a splendid field for church activities that are vital to the enforcement of a dry order of things.

Another means of creating and maintaining this necessary public sentiment in favor of non-alcoholic beverages is the gathering and presenting from time to time of convincing data showing the advantages of this change to a dry basis.

The Help of God.

Regard not much who is for thee or against thee, but see thou well to this that God be with thee in everything thou doest. Have a good conscience, and God will defend thee well. For whom God will help no man's perverseness can hurt. If thou canst be silent and suffer, without doubt thou shalt see the help of the Lord. He knows the time and manner how to deliver thee, and therefore thou shouldst resign thyself unto Him. God alone can aid, and deliver from all confusion.—Thomas A. Kempis.

Twentieth Sunday After Trinity.

Is there anything quite so attractive as cheerfulness in the midst of struggle and adversity? Novelist reformers, like Dickens and Mrs. Stowe, make their victims of injustice cheerful. Otherwise the appeal would be lost. Nothing stirs the heart of America today like the cheerfulness of our boys at the front. The collect for this Sunday prays not only that we may be kept from all things that hurt us, but that we may "cheerfully" accomplish those things that our God commands. The Epistle exhorts us to make melody in our hearts to the Lord, and the Gospel interprets the Kingdom of God as rooted in the joyful acceptance of God's gracious invitation. Is it not in accord with all this that Judas and his brethren "fought the battle of Israel with cheerfulness"? (Monday's lesson, verses 27-end, is perhaps even better reading, in light of the present war, with its mingled patriotism, faith and courage.) For New Testament correlative we have chosen a passage in which the whole matter of conflict is lifted up and placed on its true Christian plane. The source of strength is God. The highest warfare is that between spiritual forces. Note how Bernhardt begins with the Old Testament (necessity of war), but never gets up to the spiritual plane. In the evening, we have selected, first, a passage in which the prophet brings out the vocation of the Church as a fact ("Thou art, my servant, O Israel") and then its world-wide work (in which the prophet appeals to the sound portion of the Church): "It is a light thing that that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the end of the earth." Success and deliverance are then promised through the conquering Church. This passage is keyed to the Collect, but especially to the Gospel, one of the main themes of which is the extension of the Kingdom to the Gentiles. The second lesson is missionary also and its note of joy in God's work and in the reception of God's revelation illustrates all three: Collect, Epistle and Gospel. An important point in both this lesson and the Gospel is the penalty of rejected grace. The Kingdom message is appeal and not command; but the rejection of God's gracious invitation is a more serious offense than the violation of law (compare Hebrews 2:1-ff and 10:28, 29). The case of those who despised God's grace and also of those who abused it in the Gospel parable is like unto the fate of Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum in Luke 10:13-15, cities that despised their spiritual privileges and which have their modern parallels in the indifference of multitudes that lightly regard the Gospel invitation outside the Church and within.

Friday of this week is St. Luke the Evangelist and Thursday is eve thereof. The morning Prayer Book lessons for this day have been employed for the eve (shortening one of them), and we have put for the Holy Day itself, Ezekiel's Vision of Holy Waters nourishing the trees whose fruit and leaves should be for food and healing; the Call of the prophet; beginning of Acts (the composition of the Evangelist), and selection from St. Paul's Epistle to Colossians, in which he refers to St. Luke as "the beloved Physician."

The Journey to Jerusalem.

1. Whom did Jesus send before Him to preach on this journey? Luke 10:1.
2. What command to pray did He give both the Twelve and Seventy? Luke 10:2.
3. What two special prayers for Missions are in the Prayer-Book?
4. When a Lawyer and Jesus discussed Eternal Life, what was the lawyer's answer? Luke 10:27; Deut. 6:5; Lev. 19:18.
5. What picture did our Lord draw of neighborliness? Luke 10:30-35.
6. Arriving in Bethany, at whose home did He stay? Luke 10:38.
7. What lesson did Christ teach Martha and Mary? Luke 10:41, 42.
8. What Prayer-lesson did He repeat? Luke 11:2. When was it first given Matthew 6:9.
9. How did He encourage us to pray for the Spirit's help? Luke 11:13.
10. Can you recall one time when the Holy Spirit helped you to do better? Rom. 8:14.

Note: Jesus returning to Galilee after the Feast of Tabernacles in October, A. D. 29, spent some busy weeks there. Now He leaves the country of His youth for the last time ere He is crucified. We follow Samuel J. Andrews' Life of our Lord here. In this visit to Jerusalem, Jesus' unpopularity is more marked (John 7). In teaching emphasize the value of prayer for the Holy Spirit, and importance of not grieving Him, or disobeying His impulses.

The only people who succeed in living a Christian life are those who devote their whole time to it.

Collect for the Twentieth Sunday After Trinity.

O' Almighty and most merciful God, of Thy bountiful goodness keep us, we beseech Thee, from all things that may hurt us; that we, being ready both in body and soul, may cheerfully accomplish those things which Thou commandest; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. Luke's Day.

October 18.

Almighty God, who calledst Luke the Physician, whose praise is in the Gospel, to be an Evangelist and Physician of the soul; May it please Thee that, by the wholesome medicines of the doctrine delivered by him, all the diseases of our souls may be healed; through the merits of Thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Why the Church Exists.

John Fiske, who was one of the foremost scientific investigators, said of religion: "None can deny that it is the largest and most ubiquitous fact connected with the existence of mankind upon the earth."

Man is incurably religious and his religion expresses itself in many ways. This, in a measure, accounts for the variety of religious denominations.

But religion is life. It is not manufactured by priests and ministers; it is born in the hearts of men.

Life produces organisms. There is no life anywhere without organization. The inorganic is the lifeless.

Some men say: "I believe in religion, but I don't believe in the Church." They cannot have real religion without organization; not necessarily the form of organization which we find in the Church to-day, but some kind of organization must result from religion.

But true religion is a social force. No man can be religious alone. There must be a relationship to God and to man. The Church is man's expression of his religious life and instincts. It is the organization which he has formed to permit him to serve best; for true religion means service.

It should never be forgotten that man's greatest need is spiritual and that the Church is the organization which has been created to satisfy this need. This, of itself, justifies the existence of the Church.

But the success of the Church is not indicated by its great growth hrdluou indicated by its great wealth, its enormous membership, its splendid forms of worship; for, after all, religion cannot be an end in itself. The Church, in order to make good, must direct religion so that it will be of social value. It is the business of the Church to save, not itself, but the world.

"The only way of making our calling and election sure is to have it sealed by a life."

A Prayer.

Grant me, O Lord, a glad and spacious heart
To hold the love Thou dost impart.

With glowing soul help me to be
Thy messenger of charity.

Give me those things that needful be
But help me higher things to see.

If poverty should be my lot,
May I by Thee be ne'er forgot.

If store of wealth should me surround,
May I in higher joy abound.

May this my chieftest joy e'er be—
That I, in heaven, Thy face shall see.

A Changed Plan.

Alice Maude Ewell.

When Miss Angelica's visitor did not answer at once, she repeated her question, "Do you know who is buried there?" she asked again.

The man nodded—it was not a bow; a motion intimated, not familiar.

"Better than any one else," he said.

Miss Angelica frowned. "Not better than I do," she replied. "He was my only brother. I ought to know. Were you were acquainted with him?"

Again that motion of assent, this time smiling. "Better than any one else."

Miss Angelica started. This was absurd and also irritating.

"You," she cried. "Why, you are not old enough for that! He died more than fifty years ago."

The answer came with a sigh, hardly above a whisper: "No—one knows 'nat as well as I."

Miss Angelica was surprised at not feeling more vexed. She eyed the person speaking more closely. Twilight was closing in, but she noticed something which had before escaped her. The suit he wore looked like a Confederate uniform, not one of the new imitations now often seen, but an old, old one, worn and ragged. As I have said, her recollections of the war—her war—were hazy, but the uniform seemed strangely familiar. The surprising part was to see it on such a young man.

She spoke with unusual asperity.

"It is strange, sir, that you shouldn't in some way have shown an interest sooner. This grave, for instance! Who but me has cared for it all these years? Who but me has been saving money to mark the spot? Thank God, I've enough at last. It has been slow work—and always it meant self-denial. But now there'll be a headstone here. I am going to have a laurel-wreath carved upon it, and under the name a verse"—she repeated it slowly, adding: "A hundred dollars will be enough, and at last I have it."

This for Miss Angelica was a very long speech. She paused more for lack of breath than as one expecting an answer, but one came with another long sigh:

"Do you think he would want the money spent that way—now?"

Miss Angelica's own inner doubts made her resent this all the more. She began excitedly:

"Maybe you think it should be spent for this war. There is the Liberty Loan, as they call it. I suppose you've heard of the 'drive.' Oh, yes! I know things are now very serious, indeed. I know this war is terrible, and everybody must help. I, too, am doing my bit, as they say. I've worked my garden this year with my own hands. I've canned fruit till I almost dropped. I knit and sew for the Red Cross. I am trying my best—but there are some things one can't give up. Why, just think of the cause he died for—fighting against this government! What is this war to him?"

"Everything!"

Miss Angelica stared. She also shivered a little. The deep voice awed her. It went on:

"He, too, fought for what he believed in—for the right of self-government. Granted a weaker, darker side to his cause, he fought for one view of freedom. In this war he, too, would fight."

Miss Angelica frowned again. "All the more reason why he should be honored now."

"Those who honor me I will honor," God does not wait for man."

Miss Angelica was silent. She was thinking hard. "What! Give this money—his money—to the very power which fought against and crushed him! No, never!"

As if he knew her very thought, the sighing voice went on. It sounded like wind in a deep, deep hollow.

"Do you think he cares for that old quarrel now? It is past—and the brave forgive. One sees things not in part but whole, when the flesh drops away. If we had won could a land divided against itself have helped as we are helping now? Ask yourself this question, and see why we failed! God's thoughts are greater than ours. Men fight and die for a state—a province—only to find that these were but parts of the greater country. I tell you this war is for earth's best, for the things most worth saving. I tell you He knows more than you dream of. He knows how it feels to be on that western front—the long strain of hope deferred, of wounds and death always threatening. He knows wet and cold in trenches—the yearning for help, for new strong support. He knows the terrors of battle, too. He has tasted the swift death agony that thousands, nay, millions more, must taste but for our speedy victory. We must end it. There is no other way. It is our war. Would he have you spend this money now for something useless, and call it honoring him? Not so."

The voice seemed to come a long way, as from some past valley of the shadow. Miss Angelica's sight was none of the best. She peered at the dusky form, half expecting to see it moving off. It still stood there, however, an embodiment of twilight. The last yellow streak to westward had faded, and still she saw his face. It seemed revealed by an inner light, no longer smiling, but solemn and stern. The hand fell from his breast in a downward sweep. The eyes, perforce, followed it, but not before she saw what that hand had hid—den. There was a dark patch as of stain on the left side of his old gray jacket, and in its midst a small hole.

She thrilled with a darting wonder, but the hand drew her eyes down, down—to the grassy hollow at their feet. A moment they lingered there. How soft and restful it looked—how safe! And the cedar! Was it not after all enough to mark the spot? What need of more? What a pity to cut it down, even as that other life.

She lifted her eyes to the tree. It stood in slender symmetry—alone. There was no one leaning against it, not a soul in sight.

Miss Angelica's near neighbor, Captain Fanshawe, was seated over his paper next morning. Like most old ex-Confederates, he felt the call of the times. Every day brought its thrill.

He gloomed now over the war news, but noted with satisfaction the success of the Liberty Loan Drive. Though the captain's cash was scarce, he had invested every possible cent. Surely, he thought, the things now doing on land and sea would call out subscriptions. Another Red Cross ship torpedoed; another air raid on England's women and children; Russia a mock-republican traitor! The captain ground his few remaining teeth. Oh! for the young strength of 1861, when he had followed Robert Lee!

Just here came Miss Angelica's knock. The captain was a childless widower, not used to lady visitors. He jumped up in a flutter when this one was ushered in, scattering two or three dozing dogs. He drew a chair to the smoldering wood fire, and she sat down heavily, looking pale and even tragic, but uncommonly resolute. Clearly she had something to say. In one hand was a small bag which the other fingered nervously.

The captain poked the fire into a blaze. Miss Angelica slowly unclasped her bag. With a long breath she took from it a small roll of notes.

"Captain Fanshawe," she said, "I have here a hundred dollars. Can you tell me how best to invest it?"

The captain's reply came promptly: "In the service of your country, madam."

Miss Angelica fetched another long hard breath.

"Well, I knew you would say that," she said, "but I went through the form of asking. I've pretty much made up my mind about it—a Liberty Loan Bond, you know—but I wanted to talk—to tell you something. I—I think that Jack himself came back yesterday and told me to do it."

"Jack—came—back!"

The captain was staring very hard. He had seen Jack die, and for him dead men did not return.

"Come back," he repeated. "Why, dear lady! What you're going to do is all right—but the rest is fancy. You've been dreaming."

But Miss Angelica shook her head. She was still pale, but her blue eyes glowed. There seemed to the captain a new dignity and prettiness about her. She spoke in a low but firm voice.

"I saw him standing by his grave. He had on his Confederate uniform and his gun in his hand. He spoke to me—"

The captain lifted a protesting hand. "Now—now, my dear lady! My dear girl! I've known you all your life. Don't say that—don't. As Shakespeare says, 'This way lies madness.' You're too good to lose your mind. People don't come back that way—not in uniform. Sheets might do, if they came at all, but they don't."

"He came. He was in uniform—old and worn. We talked. I told him of this money—the money I'd saved, by pinching and screwing, for his headstone. I'd planned a beautiful one for him"—(and here a sob would come)—"with a laurel wreath and a Bible verse made especially for him and for all Confederates who fell. It is that one about their blood being dear in God's sight. But he said, No—that Jack wouldn't want the money spent so. He didn't tell me he was Jack, but now I feel it—I know. He said all sorts of beautiful things about this present war, and about the United States being still our country. He said the old bitterness was past—only he knew by experience what the men over there, in trenches and on battlefields, are suffering, and that we Southerners, too, must help all we can. It is our war, too. He said—But oh! I can't tell you. It seems too sacred to repeat. He spoke of death—his own death. Then all at once he wasn't there. He had just vanished away."

The captain was muttering to himself: "Ah, ah me! Poor girl!"

But Miss Angelica did not mind. She was too full of her own thoughts. There was a pause, then—"Captain Fanshawe," she asked presently, "did my brother have a scar on his cheek?"

Her hearer started. "Yes," he said, "a sabre cut—at Gettysburg."

"Was it shaped like the letter I?"

"Ye-es!" breathed the captain, with a shiver.

"And, captain—I never asked you before. The subject was so painful! Where was he shot at the last?"

The captain looked at her strangely. "Right through the heart," he said, and gave a strangled sob. He stood up, trembling, the slow tears of age running down. "Poor boy! I can see it all now—that hole in his jacket, and the life blood staining all around it. Oh, poor boy!"

He was much shaken, but the other kept on.

"Did he have dark eyes, deep set and soft?"

"Yes—oh, yes! Pretty eyes—like a girl's, sometimes."

"Then I saw him yesterday evening," said Miss Angelica. "I saw his deep dark eyes. I saw the scar on his cheek . . . and the hole . . . and the stain."

A Treat for Mrs. Cooper.

On such a glorious June day it was not strange that Mrs. Antoinette Lawrence felt that it would be wicked to waste time on tasks that could be done in any kind of weather. She meditated over the matter while she sugared Bobby's oatmeal. Then her brow cleared.

"I know! I'll take the babies and get Mrs. Cooper and go off for a whole day of exploring. I don't believe Mrs. Cooper ever went off exploring in an automobile in her whole life."

"Are you sure," Aunt Ann asked dryly, "that Mrs. Cooper would enjoy a day of exploring?"

"Now, Aunt Ann," Mrs. Lawrence protested, "don't cold-water me, please! Who could help enjoying it! Why, Kit Eversley has been talking ever since about the day I carried her off."

"What I object to," Aunt Ann replied, "is your poor psychology."

"What in the world do you mean? You know I am tremendously interested in psychology; why, I specialized in it at college."

"I'm not talking about books," said Aunt Ann. "I'm talking about psychology applied to Mrs. Cooper. You'd better look out, Antoinette!"

But Mrs. Lawrence only laughed as she lifted Bobby down from his chair. "We're going to have the most wonderful day," she said, "Mrs. Cooper especially!"

Antoinette was nothing if not capable. In a marvelously short time she had a luncheon put up and the babies ready. In ten minutes they were at Mrs. Cooper's, and Antoinette was enthusiastically explaining her plan.

"I was planning to put up cherries," said Mrs. Cooper, shaking her head.

"Oh, cherries!" Mrs. Lawrence cried. "They can be put up any day, and there may not be another day like this all summer. You've got to come, Mrs. Cooper, I won't take no for an answer."

In the end she had her way, as she usually did. She captured Mrs. Cooper, carried her for sixty miles through a wonderful bit of June world, and deposited her safe at home before 5 o'clock.

"I'm very much obliged to you, I'm sure," Mrs. Cooper said stiffly, as she got out of the car.

Antoinette stopped at the station to meet Tom, and on the way home told him enthusiastically about the treat that she had given "poor Mrs. Cooper." That night Tom and Antoinette went to the Wylies' to a meeting of the Neighborhood Club. As they came back at 11, Mrs. Cooper's kitchen was brightly lighted.

"What in the world!" Antoinette exclaimed.

Then a scent came blowing out to them—a hot, sweet scent—the scent of cooking cherries.

And suddenly Antoinette was silent. —Youth's Companion.

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

VII. Sun of My Soul.

The above hymn is taken from Keble's "Christian Year," that casket of lovely spiritual jewels that no churchman should fail to possess. John Keble shines brightly in ecclesiastical history. The son of an English clergyman, he first saw the light of day in an old English rectory, a century and a quarter ago. At the age of twenty-one, himself an ordained clergyman, he took up his ministerial work; "It ceased," says one writer, "only with his life—fifty years later."

While still a very young man he resigned a brilliant position at Oxford to accept the charge of three humble little country parishes, at a salary of less than five hundred dollars from the three. Before a year had passed the position of Archdeacon of the Barbadoes, with a salary of twenty thousand, was pressed upon him. But apparently John Keble thought not at all in terms of money, nor did high distinction enter into his serene calculations; he refused the offer and went on living, with his aged father and two unmarried sisters, among his country fields. The truth is that he was walking in the high places of his own spirit, receiving daily and hourly more sheer delight than honor or gold could bring; he was preparing his book, "The Christian Year," and a life attuned to that task must perforce have been abundantly rich already.

One fact told in connection with the first appearance of this book points us to two tender outstanding traits in the character of the man—his humility and his gentle unselfishness. It was his wish that the Christian Year should be published posthumously, but to gratify the eager pride of his old father, who was now close to the grave, he consented to its early appearance. Surely he had cause afterward to be glad of his sacrifice, for before his death—an end of unparalleled peace—the book had gone into its ninety-second edition!

In the Church hymnal Sun of My Soul is listed among the evening songs, and, indeed, with its long, drowsy-sweet lines and its falling cadences, it seems a very integral part of Sunday twilights. Few of us can sing it without returning in spirit to some old dusky room, or to some shadowy little church filled with the incense of evening prayer. The hand of the famous churchman, the profound scholar, the celebrated Tractarian advocate, never wrote to better advantage, perhaps, than when it made this simple lullaby of the soul.

Sun of my soul, Thy Saviour dear,
It is not night if Thou be near;
Oh, may no earth-born cloud arise
To hide Thee from Thy servant's eyes.

When the soft dews of kindly sleep
My weary eyelids gently steep,
Be my last thought, how sweet to rest
Forever on my Saviour's breast.

Abide with me from morn till eve,
For without Thee I cannot live;
Abide with me when night is nigh,
For without Thee I dare not die.

If some poor wandering child of Thine
Have spurned to-day the voice divine,
Now, Lord, the gracious work begin;
Let him no more lie down in sin.

Watch by the sick; enrich the poor
With blessings from Thy boundless store;
Be every mourner's sleep to-night,
Like infant's slumbers, pure and light.

Come near and bless us when we wake,
Ere through the world our way we take,
Till in the ocean of Thy love
We lose ourselves in Heaven above.

Tapioca Flour.

Measures are being taken by a California jobbing firm to secure a shipment of tapioca flour from Java, and if the flour proves all that is claimed for it, it may be more widely accepted as a substitute for wheat. Tapioca flour is considerably heavier than wheat flour, and makes into a larger and more compact loaf. The flour is said to have been extensively used for some time in California as a wheat substitute, and it mixes well with wheat flour and other cereals.

With the Same Pride.

One star for all she had,
And in her heart
One wound—yet is she glad
For all its smart
As they are glad who bear
The pangs of birth
That a new soul and fair
May come to earth,
Seeing she, too, was one
Who from Death's strife
Granted her first-born son
Proudly to Life.
Now with that very faith
Life justified,
She grants a son to Death
With the same pride.

Prayer must not be selfish. It is the language of the Kingdom of God; and the Kingdom of God is a community, a brotherhood. Prayer is the expression of the life of God's Kingdom, and that life is social.—M. R. Vincent.

"Faith and love are like a pair of compasses. Faith, like one point, fastens on Christ as the centre; and love, like the other, goes the round in all the works of holiness and righteousness."

NANCY BYRD TURNER, Editor

For the Southern Churchman. Good Night Hour.

The wee birds fold their weary wings,
The flowers shut their petals tight,
And all the tired day-time things
Get ready for the night.

Gay bees hum homeward, yellow-brown,
Tiny gray clouds lie faint and still;
The new moon pulls her nightcap down
And walks behind the hill.

In dim, sweet rooms where lights are low,
And deep and deeper shadows fall,
To bed the little children go,
And angels guard them all!

Silas Peterman's Investment.

The little girl in the faded dress trudged determinedly down the road. In one hand she carried a pail of blackberries; with the other she twisted and untwisted a string of her pink sunbonnet. She wore no shoes or stockings, but under the pink sunbonnet a pair of steady blue eyes looked out upon the world; undaunted by any hardships. Myrtilla Lucy was not a stranger to them.

All at once she stopped. She set down her pail of berries and looked in the direction of a large gray stone building, not so very far from where she stood. Her blue eyes gleamed, her lips parted in a smile, revealing even rows of teeth as white as seed pearls. She drew a long breath.

"It looks good, that school does," she whispered. "Oh, if I could only go there and learn things; I'm a-prayin' that I can."

She stood there a moment longer gazing at the big stone building gilded by the splendor of a summer's sun; then she picked up her pail of berries. She walked on until she came into closer view of the village nestling in the valley. Once she stopped to examine her foot that she cut suddenly on a stone, but she soon resumed her walking, trudging bravely on in spite of pain and weariness. She came at last into the town, with its beautiful residences, its wide streets, its well-kept lawns. At the largest and most imposing of these residences she stopped. She walked up the stone steps leading to the lawn, then to the broad, graveled walk up to the large porch. She knocked at the massive door without touching the electric bell so near it.

A moment later a white-capped maid answered it. When she saw the bare-footed little girl in the faded dress she frowned.

"If you've got anything to sell, you should go around to the back door," she said sharply. "No one but callers comes here."

The little girl pushed back her sunbonnet.

"I ain't got anything to sell, and I'm a caller, too," she answered, with a certain childish dignity. "I've come to see Mr. Peterman."

The maid started.

"Law, child!" she cried. "You ain't got no kind of a chance to see Mr. Peterman. He's the busiest man in town. He hasn't time to spend on little girls like you."

The child's eyes suddenly filled with tears.

"But I've walked eight miles," she said, resolutely winking back the tears. "I've brought him these blackberries, too, and I must see him. I can't"—her little lips set themselves in firm and sudden lines—"I can't go home until I do see him."

The maid looked at her again, at the weary little figure, the bare, dusty, small feet, the determined gleam of the blue eyes.

"Well, wait a minute," she said, not unkindly. "And I'll see what Mr. Peterman says." A moment later she came out.

"You can come in," she announced briefly.

The little girl followed the maid through a wide and spacious hall into another room, where a man sat busy with some papers at a table. He had gray hair, sharp, shrewd eyes, and strong, rugged features. There was a stern, sad look on his face as if he seldom smiled. He lifted his head when the two came in. The maid spoke.

"This is the little girl, Mr. Peterman," she said.

Silas Peterman pushed away his papers.

"Well," he said, as the maid turned away, "what is it you want with me?"

"May I sit down, sir?" she asked, in a sweet, clear voice. "You see, I've walked a long way, and once I cut my foot on a stone in the road."

"What did you take such a long walk for?" demanded Silas Peterman, still gruffly. "There, sit down, then."

The little girl took the chair he indicated, still keeping the pail of berries by her side.

"I wanted to see you," she said, simply.

"To see me? What for?"

The little girl looked back at him gravely.

"I wanted to ask you," she began, slowly, "if you wouldn't send me to that school for girls on the hill yonder. Folks tell me you got heaps of money, and I thought maybe, when I explain things to you, you wouldn't mind having me for an investment."

"An investment?" cried Silas Peterman.

The little girl nodded.

"Yes, an investment. You see, sir, I've always wanted to learn, but at home I haven't any chance. Mother has five others besides me; and, dad, he can't get on much, 'count of his poor health. I thought if I could get you to send me to school, why, when I did get educated, maybe I could do something for you. I ain't got no kind of a chance the way things are, so I picked these berries and brought 'em to you for a little present, and I made up my mind I'd come out open and honest and ask you to send me to that school. Nobody knows I come, not even mother."

Silas Peterman stared at the small, shabby figure, too astonished to speak.

"What made you come to me?" he demanded, after a short silence.

The little girl sighed.

"There wasn't any one else to come to," she replied. "I don't know of any one that's got any money except you. I heard dad tell mother how rich you were, and that you never yet put any money into anything that wasn't a good investment. And then—I thought I'd come and tell you that I'd be a good investment myself. I'm little now, but I'll grow, and maybe when I am grown you'll be glad you helped me. You never can tell what will happen in this world.

"Oh, sir, please send me to school and let me learn. I'll pay it back, truly I will. When you get old I'll come and take care of you if you need any one, but please—please send me to school. The world is just full of things I don't know about. To go without an education is most as bad as being blind. When you don't know anything you can't see with your mind. It's all dark. You understand what I mean, don't you?"

Silas Peterman continued to study the small, earnest face.

"That's a new thought," he answered, "about the mind being blind if one isn't educated. And so," he added, reflectively, "you came to me to help you, and you brought me some blackberries?"

"Yes, sir, the finest I could pick. It was all I could do for you, but I think you'll like 'em. They make good pies."

She lifted the pail of shining blackberries and placed it on the library table. There was a silence.

"Well," said Silas Peterman at last, "I am inclined to accept you as an investment, much as I know I shall regret it. I've been disappointed a great many times in those I've tried to help, but I'm going to give you a chance. It rests with you whether you make good or not."

The little girl in the faded dress sprang up.

"You won't be sorry," she cried. "I'll learn everything I can, and some day I'll do things for you—"

"Come along, Myrtilla Lucy, come along," called a man in a blue shirt and overalls one September morning. "Say good-bye to ma and the children. It's time to go."

Out from the cabin door a little girl ran swiftly. She wore a clean gingham dress, and this time she had on shoes and stockings; but she wore the pink sunbonnet. A slender, stooped-shouldered woman in a limp calico gown came out with her, followed by five little children.

"Good-bye, ma," cried the little girl, flinging her arms about her mother's neck. "You won't miss me too much, will you? I'll be home Christmas, and I'll write every week. Good-bye, Nellie and Luella and Bobby and Ned and Nancy. All of you help mother."

"Good-bye, Myrtilla Lucy," they all cried in chorus. "Write us what you have to eat and if the teacher's cross or not."

"I will," said Myrtilla Lucy. "I will."

As they jogged along in the little rough wagon her father turned to her.

"It beats all that Silas Peterman is going to educate you," he said. "Folks do say that he's powerful close, and yet sending you to school don't look much like it. Well, I'm glad you are to have your chance, Myrtilla Lucy."

At the Peterman home a physician looked grave as he studied his patient.

"Mr. Peterman," he said, finally, "you need a change, a trip, a long rest; but someone will have to go with you. Don't you know any one? Some capable young woman upon whom you could depend? Some one who would cheer and brighten you, and see to your meals and your medicine? Think now, among all the young people you know, surely there is some one."

Mr. Silas Peterman shook his head. He looked shrunken and old and sad as he sat there.

"Who wants to cheer up an old, crabbled invalid?" he replied. "What young person would be willing to devote her time to a sick man? I haven't any one related to me to look after me, and I wouldn't ask it of them if I had. We'll say no more about it."

Just at that moment the door opened and a young lady in a gray suit entered. She was slender, erect and blue-eyed—a very vision of health and hope and happiness.

"I've just heard of your illness, Mr. Peterman," she began, as she went forward to greet him. "I came on the first train."

Mr. Silas Peterman looked up. A smile broke all over the worn face.

"If it isn't Myrtilla Lucy!" he said. "But what," he added, "have you done with your school?"

"They can get a substitute," she replied gaily, "but you can't—you know you can't. Nobody can take care of you as I can. I'm going to stay while you need me. The school can take care of itself."

The physician's face immediately lost its anxious look.

"Just the thing," he cried, approvingly.

"And may I ask, sir," he added, turning to Silas Peterman, "who this young lady is?"

But it was Myrtilla Lucy who answered. She glanced down the vista of years and saw herself a small, ragged, little, barefooted girl with her pail of blackberries by her side. She saw the man who had opened the magic doors of education to her and given her an entrance into an enchanted land. Her turn had come. She looked at the physician.

"Did you not know," she said, gaily, "that over twelve years ago Mr. Peterman made an investment? He took a little ragged girl out of a log cabin and sent her to college. I am that investment."

But it was Silas Peterman who spoke this time. He, too, looked down the long years, and saw Myrtilla Lucy as she had looked that August day, with her bare feet and faded dress, her eager blue eyes. She had told him then that some day he might need her. He turned to the physician.

"Yes," he said, and the voice trembled, "she is an investment and the best one I ever made, praise the Lord."—The Epworth Herald.

Three Kinds of Kitty.

By Elizabeth Thornton Turner.

When Kitty lies beside the fire,
She's satin smooth and warm,
A long old, limp old, lazy cat
That could not do you harm.
Her purr makes music, and her claws
Are tucked away in velvet paws.

When kitty comes from out-of-doors,
She's fluffy, then, and cold;
Her whiskers bristle stiff and straight,
Her eyes are bright and bold.
She's just as friendly as can be,
And rubs against me lovingly.

When Kitty's mad, oh, my! oh, my!
She puffs up in a ball,
And does not rub against my legs
Nor friendly seem, at all.
Those times I wouldn't handle her
Quick as I would a chestnut burr!

For the Southern Churchman.
A Disastrous Escapade.

Mary P. Jackson.

"I tell you, George Washington, I gotta have that butter! Now, get a move on," and Mrs. O'Brien's florid and homely countenance disappeared from the kitchen window as she resumed her labors at the washtub. A significant chug, chug, chug from the back porch was accompanied by an occasional splash and an exclamation of "You cranky ole butter, you, why don't you turn?"

It was a bright Saturday morning in the latter part of September. Saturdays had doubled their value since school started. The rebellious boy at the churn was a lank youth of thirteen with sandy hair. His face, red like his mother's, was profusely speckled with freckles; in his own crowd he was known as "Freckles," a name which he much preferred, although his mother, who still clung to the rather doubtful hope of his some day being a great president, still called him "George Washington."

At last the butter "came," and Freckles hastened to the vacant lot, where meetings of the "gang" were held. He found most of the boys all assembled there.

"What's up fer tonight?" asked a small, white-haired urchin.

Plans and suggestions varied, but soon it was agreed upon after dark they should meet at the vacant lot and go in a body to the big house on the hill which was said to be haunted.

Though each youth declared that he did not believe a word of this report, nevertheless each would invariably steer off from the house in passing, would sit with eyes wide with terror, listening to the hair-raising tales of strange, peculiar sounds seen and heard by those who had moved from the neighborhood of the place. In fact, "The Haunted House" created as much interest and was as vital a part as anything else in the dormant little village of Beeville. Every traveler was told of its history for years and years back, where a murder had been committed, and with each year the story was enlarged and exaggerated and made more terrifying until the poor traveler would stumble to his bed in the little inn, imagining all sorts of queer, fantastical shapes on the walls of his room, and finally tumbling into bed half-dressed and ducking his head under the cover and peering cautiously out to see if some goblin had invaded his bed chamber.

The meeting broke up with a final admonition to each boy to be on time. "Hey, Tubby," "Freckles" accosted a youth favored with an exceeding amount of avoirdupois, "what become of Slim?"

"Tubby" assumed an air of importance and flipped his finger contemptuously. "Slim an' his fellers kin all go where they don't shovel snow," he said. "Him an' his gang is allus running up agin us," he added.

It was almost 11 o'clock that night when "Freckles" managed to slip cautiously from his bedroom window, for Mrs. O'Brien did not approve of future presidents running about with the "gang" at night. "Freckles" listened a moment to be sure that his mother was snoring blissfully. Then he scampered off as fast as his lank legs could carry him. He joined the boys at the lot. They all had to wait until one or two others put in their appearance. But at last all had come and they started. As they began to climb the hill "Freckles" gazed up at the moon. "It's close onter 12 o'clock," he murmured. The moon passed behind a cloud. The stars twinkled suspiciously, as though ready to go out. The big house loomed huge and dark up on the hill. No, they weren't afraid and didn't believe any of the tales of the "Haunted House"; but just the same each had sidled up to that gate as a frightened horse approaches a locomotive. The gate clanged behind the last and fourteenth boy with a grating sound that sent cold chills racing up and down "Freckles'" back. The little procession halted before the door, and Bill, who was leader, addressed them.

"Now, fellers," he said, in a voice that trembled suspiciously, "we ain't none of us scared, an' we don't want ter act like it. Now, let's go," and he gave the old door a push that sent it creaking on its hinges; very judiciously after all had entered, he left the door ajar. As they crossed the threshold, their footsteps struck the hollow floor with a sound that reminds one of an old sepulchre. And then, as they bumped into a corner, a screech owl sent forth a wild yell and flew through the open door. The sound echoed and reverberated through all the old chambers. A few lads started to follow Madame Owl's example, but Bill again addressed them. "You big cowards, you," he cried wrathfully, "it ain't nothing but a ole hooting owl," and he laughed shrilly.

They proceeded, but instead of the noisy clatter that had marked their rally, a hushed silence had fallen on the little group. Bats flitted overhead and the moon, which had again come from behind a cloud, reflected queer shapes on the wall. Bill led the way up a shaky, unsteady stair and opened a door.

"Now," he said, "folks say that Col. Johnson murdered his wife in here and later killed hisself in that room over there. Every night at 12 o'clock the ghost of Mrs. Johnson rises up and the ghost of Mr. Johnson rises up and begs her to fergive him. Boys, are you game?"

The boys gave a weak and reluctant consent to enter the room. I believe they had rather enter their graves than incur Bill's hatred. The chamber certainly presented a ghastly appearance. It was an old, spacious chamber, and a few articles of dilapidated furniture were scattered about. Cobwebs hung from the ceiling and eaves, and the black darkness of the corners seemed impenetrable.

As the boys stood waiting through the dark, silent night twelve distinct strokes sounded from the steeple clock in the village. Immediately a low moan was heard from one of those dark corners, and an apparition in white rose out from the dark background. "Freckles'" hair stood on end and his heart beat so wildly that he feared it would betray his intrusion to that walling spectre. Another spirit entered. The boys shrank back against the wall as the first apparition advanced into the center of the room, and the spirit of Col. Johnson flung itself with moans and cries at the feet of that of Mrs. Johnson. The boys, almost dead with fright, crept along the wall where the moonbeams did not strike them, endeavoring to gain an exit unseen through the door. Just as they were about to make their escape Col. Johnson's spirit wailed in a voice that surely sounded of another world, "Alas! mortals have invaded our dwelling!" and then ghosts seemed to spring up on every side. There was a mad rush. The boys themselves did not know how they managed it, but soon found themselves rolling down the stairs and tumbling out the front door, pursued by a band of shrieking demons. In the yard "Freckles" threw a rock at a ghost which struck the shade on the forehead. The boys fairly flew down the hill, holding their breath and afraid to look behind them. "Tubby," though hampered by his weight, managed to keep up as he had never kept up before. He shot a fleeting glance over his shoulder as he reached the bridge. His teeth chattered with fright. "Go-g-gosh," he stammered, "t-them ghosts is h-having f-fits. T-they's j-just rolling on the ground and k-k-kickin'." The boys did not stop to say good-night. Already visions of comfortable beds were floating before their eyes and you may be sure they were soon sleeping—though it was a troubled sleep.

Monday morning, when the teacher's back was turned, this note was passed to "Freckles":

"Dere, Freckles," look at Slim; -he musta been in a fight. He's allus running up agin somebody, Bill."

"Freckles" obeyed, and, yes, there could be no mistake as to the truth of Bill's supposition, for there on Slim's forehead was a big, swollen, black and blue bump. Oh, ignorance is bliss, but even "Freckles" wondered why the paper, with the two words, "Ghosts—Cowards," was pinned to his coat in the cloak room!

How the Pine Tree Came to Have Cones.

Once upon a time, the pine tree had no cones at all—nothing but needles.

Now, not far from the pine tree lived an oak tree, who was very dignified and haughty, and considered himself better than all the other trees in the forest, because he had wonderful little acorns on his branches.

"You have nothing but leaves," he told the other trees. "I am more fortunate than you, for I have ornaments."

Then he shook himself a little and the acorns fell all about his trunk and the next day the children came and picked them up. "You are not worth talking to," he told the poor pine tree.

"You have not even leaves—only great, ugly, sharp needles! I would not change places with you for half a kingdom!"

The pine tree pretended not to hear what the oak tree said to him, and he held himself more erect than ever and looked straight ahead of him. But all the same, he did not like the way the oak tree talked to him. He did not so much mind not having any acorns, but he did want to have the children come and play around him as they did around the oak tree.

But he never told anyone how badly he felt about it, until one day the Christmas fairy, who grants wishes to all good people, came to ask him what he would like to have given to him.

"Oh, I should like to have acorns on my branches," cried the pine tree. "I should be so happy if you would only give me a few, so that I might drop them to the children to play with."

"I could not give you acorns, because you are not an oak tree," said the fairy, "but I will give you something bigger and prettier, because you have always been such a well-behaved tree."

So she touched the pine tree with her wand, and it was covered with beautiful ornaments—bigger and handsomer than those on the oak tree. The fairy called them pine cones, and we call them that even now.

And the next day, when the children saw the pine cones, they were so pleased that they came and played about the pine tree and they carried some of the new toys home to show to their mothers. And from that day the oak tree was more polite to the pine tree, and he never spoke of his own wonderful acorns in the same way again.—The Child's Hour.

Riddle.

Riddlemaree, slim and red;
You hardly see it before it's fled.
When the bark behind it gets all around,

Alas, poor thing, it will fall to the ground!

It isn't a bird, a bush nor a tree,
Who can read my riddlemaree?

Answer to last week's riddle: The wind.

Every Christian knows on entering the service of his Master, that great trials are appointed for him; that the rightful and only entrance into the Kingdom of Heaven is through the gate of tribulation; and that, though his Master has given him armor enough to protect him against sin. He has given him no armor to ensure him against suffering.—D. Moore.

Born: In South Boston, Va., on September 23, 1918, to Chaplain and Mrs. W. J. Alfriend, a son, WILLIAM JEFFERY ALFRIEND, Jr.

Carter: Entered into rest September 24, 1918, at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va., the REV. ROBERT S. CARTER, late rector of St. Thomas Church, Orange, Va.

Pendleton: Entered into rest September 28, 1918, at Elizabeth, N. J., SAMUEL H. PENDLETON, formerly of Richmond, Va., in his seventy-eighth year. Interment was in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond, Va.

Samuel H. Pendleton entered into rest on September 28 at the residence of his son, Arthur T. Pendleton, in Elizabeth, N. J. He was a native of Richmond, Va., and a Confederate veteran, having joined the Second Company, Richmond Howitzers at the beginning of the war and serving until the surrender. In December, 1864, he married Miss Sarah Ann Pendleton and at the close of the war removed to New York and a few years later to Elizabeth, N. J., where he resided until his death. Celebrating his golden wedding four years ago.

For many years Mr. Pendleton was an active member of Trinity Church in Elizabeth, serving as vestryman and warden, but changed his membership to St. John's when Rev. Otis A. Glasbrook, D. D., a friend of his boyhood, became rector of that church.

Mr. Pendleton is survived by his wife, son and one sister, Mrs. G. Percy Hawes, of Richmond.

The interment was in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond, Va. The active pallbearers were members of the Howitzers' Association, and the honorary pallbearers were Captain John A. Coke, D. S. McCarthy, S. H. Hawes, William H. McCarthy, Major H. C. Carter, Carlton McCarthy and John T. Jones, with all of whom Mr. Pendleton served during the war.

Randolph: Died at his home in Richmond, Va., on Monday, October 7, BEVERLEY RANDOLPH, son of the late William F. Randolph and Rosalie O'Fallon Randolph, of Millwood, Clarke County, Va. He leaves his wife, formerly Miss Harriet Shields, of Richmond; a sister, Mrs. C. W. Grandy, Jr., of Norfolk, and three brothers, Messrs. Benjamin O'F. Habit.

There is a decline and fall in the history of the soul, as well as in that of an empire or a society. There is a course of moral degradation which may begin in a wilful desire, or in a secret meeting against truth and honor. It may be marked merely in a single infirmity, or manifested in an unusual and ashaming frailty. But it may pass on to repeated and more daring wrongdoing. It does pass on too often, through many stages, to a wanton and callous iniquity. There may be no marked outward sign for years. There is only a lessened interest in the things of the spirit, a neglect of public worship and of private prayer, a lowering of the habits of the home; a delight in pleasures which are perilous to purity, the hardening of the heart in the pursuit of a worldly ambition. But no moral life ever stands still. Surely and inevitably, if sometimes slowly, its path slopes down to darker evil. Habits which are yielded to become a chain. Passions acquire strength and become a torture while they degrade. The imagination riots in pictures of shame. Then the vultures begin to gather. But it is not until a lower level is reached, and until a moral apathy has set in, and the man is "past feeling, given over to work all lasciviousness with greediness," that moral death takes place, and then the vultures swoop down upon their prey.—Selected.

Cathedral Service in the Interest of Interdenominational Co-Operation in War Time Work.

The vesper service at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York City, on September 29, was a notable exhibition of Christian brotherhood and interdenominational co-operation. It was a special service in the interest of the General War Time Commission of the churches, held by invitation of the Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, Bishop of New York. A large congregation of seven hundred people, gathered from all the churches of the city, added to the significance of the service, which was intended to embody the united Christmost appropriately held in a cathedralary touch was given by the presence of tian sentiment of the nation. A military in the chancel of an army chaplain who, with the Rev. Frederick H. Knubel, Chairman of the National Lutheran Commission for Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare, participated in the service by reading the Scripture lessons. In the procession were the Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, the Rev. William I. Chamberlain, the Rev. Henry B. Washburn and the Rev. Albert G. Lawson, representing, respectively, the war time agencies of the Congregational, Reformed in America, Episcopal and Baptist churches. Dr. Lawson was also present as the representative of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. The addresses were by the Rev. William Adams Brown, Secretary of the General War Time Commission, and Rev. Frank Mason North, President of the Federal Council.

In welcoming the representatives of sister churches, Bishop Greer spoke of the war as beyond and above all other wars, in having been lifted upon a high moral level, springing from the deep conviction that it is a great moral crusade directed toward a moral triumph over wanton and brutal force. He pointed out how this common moral aim is healing divisions of Christendom, and expressed the confident hope that God is bringing the churches together to stay together in common moral warfare against injustice, unrighteousness, and wanton cruelty and tyranny.

In his address Dr. Brown explained the General War Time Commission to be a body of one hundred persons chosen from the different religious agencies, denominational and interdenominational, which are dealing in direct and responsible ways with the new problems which the war has raised. "It is an attempt," he said, "to mobilize for war service the nation's spiritual resources as they have been garnered through the ages into the storehouse of the Christian Church." Speaking of the way in which the Commission has served as an agency through which the churches can act together in matters of common interest without sacrifice of principle, he described the building in Camp Upton, known as "Church Headquarters," erected and paid for by seven denominations, opened with a service in which Roman Catholics, Protestants and Hebrews participated, and at which the commanding general delivered the address, and now used by all the religious forces of the camp with the utmost sympathy and harmony.

Dr. Brown also said that the Commission had contributed to the religious welfare of the army and navy through its work for the chaplains, and told how in the Training School for Chaplains, at Camp Zachary Taylor, where Baptist sits side by side with Episcopalian, and Methodist with Presbyterian; while Protestant holds fellowship with Roman Catholic, and Hebrew with Christian, "there is being born in men a new understanding and a new respect for one another, a consciousness of unity which will not only make the chaplains a tower of strength for the spiritual life of the army, but which is big with promise for the future of religion when the war is over."

He described a conference in the office of the Secretary of War in Washington, in which a group of seventeen men, meeting at the invitation of the Commission, from the North and the South, half of whom were white and half colored, talked over with the representatives of the Government the needs of the negro troops and the aspirations of the people they represent.

The Commission has also, said Dr. Brown, outlined a program for the future which will enable the churches to deal unitedly and constructively with the new problems which have emerged during the war—problems of race, political organization, education and particularly of industry. The Commission, he said, is a "confession of faith in the power of the Church of Christ under the vivifying touch of the Divine Spirit to lift herself above the parochial tasks with which, like the nation, she has been too long content to become conscious anew of those reserves of spiritual energy laid up in her heart and brain for the service of the new world waiting to be born, to vindicate through her demonstration of the fact that free churches, like free peoples, can function effectively and unitedly for great causes, those principles of democracy for which we and our Allies are fighting, and so to regain again for the Church of Jesus Christ that place of leadership in the affairs of men and of nations to which we believe in the providence of Almighty God she is called."

Dr. North pointed out how the war has lured men and women into a genuine although often an unconscious interpretation of Christ in mercy and sacrifice which has become a passion; the desire for self-surrender running through the veins of humanity like a fever.

"The utterances of President Wilson," he said, "succeeding one another like the penetrating tones of a temple bell, have inspired the heart of the world because in them has been heard the forceful statement of the fundamental principles of divine law which reached back to Sinai and to the charter of personal rights, of community order, of mercy, truth and good will, which finds its golden statement complete only in the teachings of our Lord. The program of Jesus is sinking into the consciousness of the world."

Dr. North called upon the Church to fulfil its commission of disclosing and interpreting Jesus Christ to this age, to represent the living Christ in these tense, fearful days, and teach men that He is to be found in life "the present Master of the present world."

NEVADA.

Rt. Rev. G. C. Hunting, D. D., Bishop.

St. Mary's Church, Winnemucca, has recently received Eucharistic candlesticks, altar desks, altar service book and alms basin as memorials to Mrs. Amy Searing Turman from her friends. Mrs. Turman was the wife of the vicar and endeared herself to all by her splendid character and good works.

The Rev. Joseph Wallace Gunn has resigned as vicar of St. Bartholomew's Church, Ely, to become rector of Emmanuel Church, Kellogg, Idaho. The Rev. James MacLaughlin, of Alamosa, Col., will become vicar of Ely on January 1 next.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The nouns, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

St. Andrew's Church, Battle Mountain, has received the gift of a fine phonograph for use in the Guild Hall.

The Rev. Ernest H. Price, Elko, has been appointed Secretary of Convocation to serve until the next meeting in January.

Reno: On Sunday, September 29, the Feast of St. Michael's and All Angels, the Bishop dedicated a service flag for Trinity Church, Reno. The flag has forty-four blue stars and three gold stars. Forty-four is twenty-three per cent of the communicant list of one hundred and eighty-nine.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Dr. Alfred W. Arundel, who has recovered from his recent illness, has taken up work in South Carolina under Bishop Guerry, and should be addressed the Oregon Hotel, Greenwood, S. C.

The address of the Rev. H. N. Tucker is changed from Boynton, Virginia, to care Y. M. C. A. Building 76, Camp Hancock, Georgia.

With the hearty approval of the vestry, the Rev. J. D. Cummins, rector of St. Paul's Church, Centreville, Maryland, is giving special instruction in the high school, due to the serious shortage of teachers.

The Rev. J. J. Gravatt, Jr., who recently accepted a call to Trinity Church, Staunton, Virginia, has entered the Chaplains' Training School at Camp Taylor, Ky.

The Rev. James Mills, formerly Minor Canon of the Cathedral, became priest in charge of Trinity Memorial Church, Warren, Pa., on September 15. The vestry has requested him to care for the parish until the return of the rector, the Rev. William H. Jones, chaplain of the 135th Field Artillery now in France.

The Rev. Albert L. Longley, rector of Trinity Church, Bayonne, N. J., and Archdeacon of Jersey City, has resigned to accept the rectorship of Grace Church, Nyack, N. Y., and expects to take up his new duties on November 1.

During the absence of the rector, who is serving as chaplain in the army, the services at the Church of Our Saviour, Jenkintown, Pa., will be in charge of the Rev. Clarence C. Silvester.

The Rev. T. J. M. Van Duyne has entered upon his duties as senior curate at the Chapel of the Intercession, Trinity Parish, New York City.

The Rev. Harrison Baldwin Wright has recovered his health and is again established at the rectory of the Church of St. Asaph, Bala, Pa., and the work of the church is progressing rapidly.

The Rev. Bruce V. Reddish, rector of Trinity Church, New Castle, Pa., who spent the summer months at Camp Meade as one of the civilian chaplains, has returned to his parish, and the Rev. Arthur L. Seifer, rector of Christ Church, Meadville, Pa., has gone to fill the place until January 1.

The statement in the October "Diocese," the Diocesan paper of South Carolina, that the Rev. Rollin D. Malany had accepted call to Church of the Resurrection, Greenwood, S. C., is incorrect.

The Rev. Harry L. Taylor, rector of Trinity Church, Erie, has been granted a seven months' leave of absence by his vestry, on account of the illness of his wife, and has gone to Southern Florida for the winter. The Rev. Claude C. Thomson will take charge of the parish during the rector's absence.

The Rev. Joseph Francis John, who has been rector of St. Andrew's Church, Clearfield, Pa., for the past fourteen years, has resigned.

Miss Cary Gravatt, daughter of the Bishop of West Virginia, and for several years his Secretary, has entered the Red Cross Canteen service with the American Expeditionary Forces. She sailed for France on September 17.

Ordinations.

On September 24, in St. John's Church, Ithaca, N. Y., the Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, Bishop-Coadjutor of Central New York, ordained deacon Mr. Ralph Simpson Nanz, who was presented by the Rev. Henry P. Horton, rector of the parish. The sermon was preached by the Rev. F. W. Dickinson, and the Rev. Messrs. F. W. Henstridge and E. G. White were present and assisted in the service. The Rev. Mr. Nanz has been an instructor at Cornell University and will continue in war work in connection with that institution in the Agricultural Department, to which he was appointed last year. This work is of such a nature that he will be enabled to take charge of parishes at Speedsville and Slaterville, near Cornell, where he has already been ministering as a lay reader.

In Trinity Church, Milton, Vt., on St. Matthew's Day, the Rev. Arthur Albert Bessey was advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop of the Diocese, assisted by the Bishop-Coadjutor, who preached the sermon. The Rev. E. S. Stone presented the candidate and the Rev. Messrs. G. W. Smith, L. C. Denney and J. W. Tripp also assisted in the service.

Deaths.

The Rev. Ralph Birdsall, rector since 1903 of Christ Church, Cooperstown, N. Y., died on September 23. Mr. Birdsall received his theological training in the General Theological Seminary and at the Berkeley Divinity School and was ordained deacon in 1897 and priest in 1898 by Bishop Doane.

The Rev. Robert Lowry, a non-parochial clergyman of the Diocese of New York, residing in Mt. Vernon, died in St. Luke's Hospital, New York, on September 17, aged eighty-two years. He was for many years vicar of St. Thomas' Chapel, East Sixtieth Street.

If you suffer with any chronic disease that does not seem to be benefited by drugs, such as dyspepsia, indigestion, sick headache, neuralgia, rheumatism, gall stones, liver or kidney diseases, or any other chronic ailment involving impure blood, you are cordially invited to accept the liberal offer made below. It is a grave mistake to assume that your case is incurable simply because remedies prepared by human skill have not seemed to benefit you. Put your faith in nature, accept this offer and you will never have cause to regret it.

I believe this is the most wonderful Mineral Spring that has ever been discovered, for its waters have either restored or benefited nearly everyone who has accepted my offer. Match your faith in this Spring against my pocket-book, and if the water does not relieve your case I will make no charge for it. Clip this notice, sign your name, enclose the amount, and let this wonderful water begin its healing work in you as it has in thousands of others.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"There is no heavenly music in a gloomy heart."

One symptom of backsliding is a lack of thankfulness.

You need not be old just because you are, for the present, occupying an old tent.

Patience is never conquered; she is always victorious, and ever remains at last mistress of the position.—Catherine of Siena.

If instead of a gem, or even a flower, we should cast the gift of a loving thought into the heart of a friend, that would be giving, I think, as the angels must give.—George MacDonald.

The finest line in every landscape is the horizon line. On the border land of thought lie the reverencies. Where petty certainties end, there our holy worship begins.—Dr. Jenkin L. Jones.

"Life, in the view of the Old Testament scriptures, began in a garden. But it is to end in a city. Life in a garden may be an idyllic existence, but life in a city is the higher condition and more helpless discipline."

You cannot long associate with a person without being impressed by him; the man who communes with God must come to look at things as God looks at them, and this is the supreme reward of prayer.—C. L. Goodall.

"It is one thing to prevent a quarrel by refusing to be actively drawn into it, and it is quite another thing to understand your opponent's point of view and deal with it kindly enough to bring about a living and reciprocal spirit of peace."

In this world hearing and speech go together. It is not otherwise in the language of God's kingdom. To pray in the spirit depends upon our hearing God's voice. Just as far as we listen to the voice and language that God speaks shall we learn to speak in the voice and language that God hears.

"The world would be better and brighter if people were taught the duty of being happy, as well as the happiness of doing their duty. To be happy ourselves is a most effectual contribution to the happiness of others."—Sir John Lubbock.

For myself, it is only since His divine image rose before my soul that I have properly learned what is the true "tate of man. Previously I always measured myself with the little, and so appeared in my own eyes to be great. Now I measure myself with Him, and have become very little, indeed.—A. Tholuck.

There is a story of an Arab beggar who sat at the gate of a rich man's house on whose bounty he depended. One day the rich man needed a messenger for instant service, and, seeing the beggar, called upon him, whereupon the beggar haughtily replied: "I solicit alms; I do not run errands." Is not this the practical reply of the thousands who claim God's grace, yet refuse to have a part in carrying his urgent message to the lost?

As with a garden in winter, nothing we see in it tells us what it will be when the spring winds have loosened the frost, only we know that there is life beneath the snow, and that one day that life will show itself in leaves and blossoms and fruit. So with the believer. He will one day have a part in that glorious revealing of the sons of God for which creation is waiting. Meanwhile his spiritual life, like that of a plant safe all the winter in the root of it, is hid with God.

A Quaint Reply.

A dear old Quaker lady, when asked what cosmetic she used to produce such a lovely complexion, replied sweetly: "I use for my lips, truth; for my voice, prayer; for my eyes, pity; for the hands, charity; for the figure, uprightness; for the heart, love." Truth, prayer, pity, charity, uprightness and love! Could there be a more perfect circle of jewels to adorn womanhood? They are priceless, yet free to all.—Christian Observer.

The Futility of Worry.

We Christians must not worry. "Be not anxious," said our Master, "let not your hearts be troubled." That law has not been repealed to this day. It is worry that chokes the Word, worry that bends the back, worry that makes us slaves of things. We shall get through. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able." If our religion is worth a pin to us, we ought to believe that; we ought to believe in God's presence and sympathy, and be sure that He can make us happy, if need be, without anything else. Worry on our part is lack of faith in God. If only we get high enough, mountains become little; if we could but rise to the height of the thought, "Now are we the sons of God," how petty would become our vexations and privations, how foolish our feverish strivings, how faithless our forebodings!—B. J. Snell.

Why Does Not God Stop the War?

When Rev. Joseph Snell was preaching in Lydiard Street Church, Ballarat, a few Sundays evenings ago, an individual in the congregation called out in a loud, sad voice, "Why does God not stop this cruel war?" Many people are asking this not audibly, but silently. Is there an answer? The Southern Cross says that the problem in the light, both of the Bible and of what we know of our own nature and of human history generally, is sufficiently intelligible. It is the problem of man's free will and of the dark possibilities of sin as well as the radiant possibilities of goodness that endowment of our nature creates. Moral goodness means making the right choice when the wrong choice is possible; it is doing good when we have the power to do evil. If we were mere machines, we should be incapable of either evil or good. The moral problem involved in the war is identical in character with the problem of every household and of every mother's child. We have power to do wrong. God, as an act of omnipotence, could dismiss us from existence; but He could not make us incapable of sin without at the same time reducing us to the level of machines and making goodness for us impossible. In the Germany of to-day we have a whole nation which has made a deliberate choice of wicked ideas, is pursuing them by wicked methods, and is employing the whole machinery of war to achieve its evil ends. We are offered by Germany to-day the most tremendous example of the evil of sin to be found in history; and the educational effect of this on the human race must be tremendous and enduring. This manifestation of evil is calling out answering manifestations of righteousness on a scale hitherto unknown in history; and in the long run the human race will be the richer for even the suffering and waste of this war.—The Methodist.

Fervent, effectual, importunate prayer is the utterance of God's Spirit, making intercession within us. It is not our own voice, "for we know not what we should pray for as we ought"; we have to be taught how to pray, and our constant prayer should be for the spirit of prayer.—H. Melville.

The fact that enemies are loved is proof that Christ has been on earth.

Strong, Forceful Men With Plenty of Iron In Their Blood—

These Are the Ones With the Power and Energy To Win

"Many a capable man or woman falls just short of winning because they don't back up their mentality with the physical strength and energy which come from having plenty of Iron in the blood," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Out-door Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. "Lack of Iron in the blood not only makes a man a physical and mental weakling, nervous, irritable, easily fatigued, but it utterly robs him of that virile force, that stamina and strength of will which are so necessary to success and power in every walk of life. It may also transform a beautiful, sweet-tempered woman into one who is cross, nervous and irritable. To help make strong, keen, red-blooded Americans there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron. It often increases the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, run-down people in two weeks' time." Nuxated Iron is now being used by over three million people annually, including such men as Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, former Secretary of the Treasury, and ex-Governor of Iowa; former United States Senator and Vice-Presidential nominee Charles A. Towne; General John L. Clem (Retired), the drummer boy of Shiloh who was sergeant in the U. S. Army when only twelve years of age; also United States Judge G. W. Atkinson of the Court of Claims of Washington and others.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE: Nuxated Iron, which is recommended above is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

Beyond.

Never a word is said,
But it trembles in the air,
And the truant voice has sped
To vibrate everywhere;
And perhaps far off in eternal years
The echo may ring upon our ears.

Never are kind acts done
To wipe the weeping eyes,
But, like flashes of the sun,
They signal to the skies;
And up above the angels read
How we have helped the sorer need.

Never a day is given,
But it tones the after years,
And it carries up to heaven
Its sunshine or its tears;
While the tomorrows stand and wait,
The silent mutes by the outer gate.

There is no end to the sky,
And the stars are everywhere,
And time is eternity,
And the here is over there;
For the common deeds of the common day
Are ringing bells in the far-away.
—Henry Burton.

Peace.

Peace is not silence or the absence of noise. Men find the peace of God in the suffering and hell of battle. Peace is not a quality of life peculiar to the next world, as is suggested by our cemetery inscription. Peace is here and now, at the heart of all enduring struggle for righteousness, the present possession and inheritance of the sons of God. Peace is the product of right relationships. Sin and wrong-doing take man out of his true relationship with God and man. The result is friction, remorse, mental suffering. Forgiveness is the resetting of our life in right adjustment with God. The result is pardon and peace. Peace is, therefore, the basis of the most intense service to the needs of others. It is life set out on its true course, drawing all its strength and energy from God. Peace is thus an inner serenity of life which passes the understanding and keeps the whole life, heart and mind close to God. The following prayer, faithfully prayed, will work wonders in a restless life:

O God, may I find in Thee peace and rest and joy. Lift up my soul above the weary round of harassing thoughts to Thy eternal Presence. Lift up my soul to the pure, bright, serene, radiant atmosphere of Thy Presence, that there I may breathe freely, there repose in Thy Love, there be at rest from myself, and from all things that dishearten me, and thence return, arrayed in Thy Peace, to do and bear what shall please Thee. Amen.—Selected.

The highest Christian life can only be enjoyed by those who are wrestling with the world, and calling the unbelieving to the Saviour's feet. The higher Christian life is not possible to those who coddle and nurse their own souls, and spend all their strength in hunting for spiritual joy and securing their own salvation. Just in proportion to our anxiety about the salvation of others will complete salvation be attained by ourselves. Christ will speak most graciously to our souls when our mouths are open to declare His word.—J. G. Greenhough.

Proverbs 1:33.

My Saviour! when some lying fear
Has breathed into Thy servant's ear.
When the world comes with warning sign

Between Thy soldier's eye and Thine—
Oh, keep the girded spirit free;
Oh, shield the heart that cleaves to Thee.

The fear dishonored soon is past;
The pang embraced will vanish fast;
But Thou on Whom alone I lean
For all a hiding-place can mean, and,
Thou wilt rule on through good or ill,
And so shall he who does Thy will.

For glory and for greatness made,
A weak thing in Thy bosom laid,
A base thing by its own design,
A precious thing through learning
Thine—

This heart, whate'er its peril be,
Can have no need to shrink from Thee.

Ah, no! in this our solemn strife
The least of Thy commands is life.
If the mere glance our eyes obey
Has issues that we cannot weigh,
They rest in Thy unbounded care,
And we may boldly meet them there.

Though evil to our quickened sense
Appear omnipotent, immense,
Thy guiding truth will bear us through
The worst its conquered force may do,
And make it, ere the conflict cease,
A guard of our eternal peace.

Strong is the bond, when flesh would flee,
That keeps the listening soul with
Thee;

And fears that at Thy word depart
Will leave Thy servant where Thou art,
All the world's warning signs above
In one supreme, directing love.

—A. L. Waring.

A Greater Boon.

God gives us a better mercy than the blessing of forgetfulness. The Lethe which obliterates from recollection a sinful past is a poor hope compared to the blood of cleansing, which permits us to remember sin without distress, and confess it without alarm. With a new self, cut off from this dreadful moral continuity with the past, eased of one's inheritance of self-reproach, and made quick within with the seed of a new future, all things seem possible to a man. Old things pass away;
all things become new.—J. O. Dykes.

Worship is the effort of the soul to realize the Divine presence and to partake of the Divine life. When the soul is perpetually as conscious of the Divine presence as of the presence of an external world, and partakes of the Divine life as really and consciously as we partake now of each other's life, then worship becomes no longer an act to which we compel ourselves, but a state—the constant state of the soul before God—as real, as natural, as enforced, as general, as sufficing, as gently reciprocal as that of two souls who, together in the same place, and under the same conditions, live one life. "Beholding" the glory of the Lord, ever doing it, sitting with eyes fixed like an artist student before a masterpiece, until the work becomes so real and living that it speaks quietly, silently, with unsyllabled speech to the soul of the man beholding, until his feelings are changed, his ideas are changed. The old ignorant self is no longer there—into the image of the great master he is charged, and the charge keeps going on from state to state, each an advance upon the other, and all by the spirit of the Great Master entering into him and molding him.—R. Thomas.

The Revelation of God.

Knowing as I do what the revelation of God means to me, knowing what God's Fatherhood and the presence of God's Spirit is to my own life, my whole heart goes out in infinite pity towards those whose lives are un-blessed by what is to me the very pole-star of my existence. I cannot bear to think of some stumbling blindfold through the pitfalls of life while my hand is clasped by a never-failing Guide; or of others who look forward to the end of their earthly life with dread and trembling while I see only the outspread arms of the everlasting
Father and the welcome of a lifelong Friend.—Quintin Hogg.

BEFORE YOU GO TO FRANCE LEARN
FRENCH AND ABOUT FRANCE

"The American Soldier in France"

A military guide-book for our troops going abroad, by Geo. N. Tricoche, late of the French army.

Read what the chief of staff says about it:

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY
FORCES

Office of the Chief of Staff

(Extracts from a letter dated General Headquarters, October 15, 1917.)

"... The six copies of 'The American
Soldier in France' have arrived. One copy will be given to General Pershing... and the remainder will be distributed to staff
officers...."

"I have examined the book and I am of the opinion that Mr. Tricoche has given an exceedingly valuable little book to the American soldier. It brings together a vocabulary of technical and military French which I have never before seen assembled under a single cover.... Personally, it appears to me as an exceedingly useful book, not alone for instruction in French, but for an insight into the French organization, etc."...

WHEN THE CHURCH IS CLOSED.

Nearly everywhere the churches and Sunday-schools are closed for a few Sundays on account of the prevailing influenza. Good Christian people feel this necessary precaution as an additional distress which this visitation is causing, for this is the time that they would especially desire to seek the consolations and unite in the intercessions of God's house. But since this may not be, may we suggest that householders on each Sunday gather "the church that is in their house" and read the service of the church with such special prayers as the occasion suggests. Thus no great breach in the habit of church worship will occur, and united prayer will still be made by the congregation separated in presence but not in heart.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

The whole civilized world has watched with mingled surprise and delight the steady progress and brilliant achievements of the British army in Palestine under General Allenby.

Places through which it has been moving have given it a picturesque setting, which is peculiarly attractive to Bible students.

We matter-of-fact Anglo-Saxons do not always realize the extent of the power which is wielded by superstition over Orientals, and it may be that this power has had a share in the well-nigh miraculous success which has been attending the allied army in its triumphant march north from Jerusalem.

Several years ago the Kaiser made a visit to Jerusalem, but he did not consider it in keeping with the dignity of a Hohenzollern to enter a walled city through a gate, so he required that a part of the city wall should be thrown down for his admittance. This laid the foundation for the bitter hatred of the Germans which has existed since that time among the inhabitants of Jerusalem and the Holy Land.

We are told by the noted traveler, Frank Hampton Fox, that upon the occasion of this spectacular entrance into Jerusalem an old Arab soothsayer proclaimed that "the real conqueror or deliverer of Jerusalem would enter it on foot."

We do not know whether or not General Allenby had heard of this prophecy when he and his staff dismounted and marched on foot to take official possession of the Holy City in October, 1917. At the time he stated that he did not think it proper for him to ride where the Saviour had walked. Another ground for the respect, amounting almost to awe, with which this Englishman is regarded by the Arab allies is on account of his name. The word "Allah" meaning God in the Arabic language and the word "Nabi" prophet, the two together, "Allah-Nabi," sounding almost exactly like "Allenby," with the emphasis slightly changed.

ARE WE DOING IT?

The president and general counsel of the American National Shipbuilding Corporation made the statement the other day that at the beginning of the war the wealth of the United States was $250,000,000,000, exceeding by $30,000,000,000 the combined wealth of France, Great Britain and Germany. Continuing, he said: "America's wealth has increased since August, 1914. It has one-fourth of the commerce of the globe and has accumulated a third of the gold supply of the world."

Last month our National Food Administrator made the statement that after a year of war we now have on hand nearly three times as much food as we had when we entered the struggle.

When we consider these tremendous material blessings which we are enjoying it should inspire us to ask ourselves whether or not we are rendering to God and to our fellow-men a service that is anywhere near proportionate to the mercies which He has shown to us.

Many years ago the prophet Samuel, in concluding his retiring address announcing the change of the Israelites from the era of the Judges to that of a Monarchy, used these warning words of exhortation: "Only serve the Lord in truth with your whole heart, for consider how great things he has done for you."

If ever there was a time when such words were applicable to a nation it is now in these United States of America.

Read over the figures at the head of this article again and consider how great things God has done for us, and then let us ask ourselves with intense earnestness: "Are we serving the Lord in truth with our whole hearts?"

A CASE AGAINST THE BREWERS.

The Anheuser-Busch Brewing Company is running a full page advertisement in most of the city daily papers, setting forth its loyalty to the United States Government and attempting to show its patriotism by citing the large amount invested by it in Liberty Bonds. The worth of this effort is somewhat marred by the fact that we all know that Liberty Bonds afford by far the safest depository for surplus dollars of any corporation, and that it is no act of charity to buy them.

Another feature of the statement of this corporation which is impressive by its absence is any denial of connection with the loan of nearly half a million dollars to Arthur Brisbane for the purchase of the Washington Times. In the absence of such denial the case against the Brewers' Association would seem to be convictive.

A memorandum presented by Senator Jones before the Senate Committee investigating its charges asserts that documentary evidence alone would establish the following facts:

"That the United States Brewers' Association, individual brewers and corporations have financed newspapers in the interest of the liquor traffic, and deceived the public as to secret arrangements for money loaned, which in some cases was to be repaid only at the discretion of the newspaper owner out of the profits of the paper, if there should be any profits.

"That the United States Brewers' Association and certain individual brewers who helped finance certain newspapers advocating the liquor traffic, also contributed to the national German-American Alliance and financed the publication of its official organ after the sinking of the Lusitania and other similar German atrocities.

"That the United States Brewers' Association and certain individual brewers and brewery corporations have been convicted, plead guilty or nolo contendere to charges of violation of Federal corrupt practices act and other criminal laws, and paid several hundreds of thousands of dollars in fines and penalties.

"That the National German-American Alliance was financed in part by the Brewers' Association and individual brewers and liquor dealers.

"That the Brewers' Association, through organizations whose identity has been concealed, such as the so-called National Association of Commerce and Labor, Manufacturers' and Dealers' Association, Business Men's Association, Taxpayers' League, Home Rule and other organizations, have made political surveys relating to the attitude of candidates for office and how they could be influenced and controlled in the interest of the liquor traffic. . . . Said organizations and individuals also have encouraged the starting of strikes in dry territory and instigated local troubles in shops and factories whose owners and managers favored prohibition.

"That the brewery trade and liquor traffic is pro-German in its sympathy."

Here and There

One good deed always leads to another, though it may take some time to do it. Nearly twenty years ago the United States Government remitted to China her portion of the indemnity levied by the great powers of the world on account of the Boxer uprising. Today comes news that Japan has agreed to remit her portion of the balance due on this indemnity, provided that the money so refunded be utilized to found an educational institution. Nothing will do more to bind together the nations of the world than this form of international education.

The Anglican Diocese of Australia went on record at a recent meeting in Melbourne as being opposed to allowing the former possessions of Germany in the Pacific Ocean to be returned to that power after the war. The Island of New Guinea and one of the Samoa group were the most important of these Pacific possessions. Germany has proven herself beyond question unfit to govern subject peoples and these islands, as well as her other colonial possessions throughout the world, should be turned over to England and credited to Germany on that enormous bill for damages which she will have to pay to England.

The Czechoslovak National Council considers the recent offer of Austria to accord them autonomy as coming too late and being merely a "death-bed repentance." Nothing short of national independence will satisfy these heroic people who have suffered so long under the Austrian yoke and fought so gallantly for their freedom during the past months.

It is also reported now that Hungary is on the point of secession from the dual monarchy, so that it looks as though the power which fired the first gun in the world war was at the point of disintegration.

Nish, the former capital of Serbia, is now almost surrounded by the Franco-Serbian troops and will probably have fallen before these words appear in print. It is not generally known that Nish was the birthplace of Constantine the Great, who played so large a part in early Christian history.

Queen Marie of Rumania is probably the most outstanding female figure which the war has produced. She has been indefatigable in hospital relief work, and frankly outspoken in her opposition to the treaty of Bucharest imposed upon her people by the Germans when the fall of Russia left Rumania helplessly alone upon the Eastern front. Her people under the leadership of their courageous queen will undoubtedly return to the fight the moment the German garrisons are withdrawn, as they soon must be to bolster up the collapsing Western front. Even now there is a Rumanian legion formed from the three hundred thousand residents of that country in the United States, the fighting men of Rumania with the enemies of Germany in the Italian and French armies.

The splendid spirit of democracy, inspired by the suffering created through the Spanish influenza epidemic is almost worth the sad experience through which we are passing. In an emergency hospital in the capital of one of our Southern States the wife of the governor of the State is working as a nurse in the colored ward. In this same hospital persons from every station in life have volunteered as nurses and orderlies, and the most menial duties are being performed cheerfully by persons who are giving their services entirely free of charge.

Liberty churches are the newest product of these war times. They have just been determined upon through united action of the Government and a joint committee of the War Time Commissions of the various religious bodies and the Home Missions Council. Throughout the plane for Liberty churches Protestants, Roman Catholics and Jews stand on the same footing.

There are to be about thirty of these new organizations. After considering several different plans, it was decided that Liberty churches should not have separate buildings but should use community houses and public school buildings.

APPEAL FOR BOOKS FOR THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL IN LIBERIA.

Mr. Editor: An urgent call has come from Liberia for certain books needed by the Dean of the Theological School for his men. There can be no doubt that many or all of these are to be found among the less used volumes in many a clerical library. I am, therefore, asking the courtesy of your columns to appeal to owners of these books to take them from their honorable repose, and give them a new lease of life in the hands of the men of Liberia who are working so valiantly to fit themselves for the ministry.

The titles asked for are as follows, and on any books sent to the address below by parcel post, the postage will be refunded. Outlines of Theology, Modge; The Thirty-nine Articles, Browne; Evidences of Christianity, Paley; Butler's Analogy; Pearson on the Creed; The Book of Common Prayer, Even Daniel; Church History, Fisher; Old and New Testament History, Maclear; Ecclesiastical Polity, Hooker; Elements of Moral Theology, Elmendorf; Hebrew Grammar, Gene-sius; New Testament in Greek with Lexicon, Westcott and Hort; Hebrew Lexicon; Greek Lexicon. Except for the Lexicons, eighteen copies of each book are needed, and I am sure they will be forthcoming.

THE CLERGY AND THE WAR.

Mr. Editor: Your comment on Bishop Rhinelander's charge that the Clergy have fallen short of their duty in connection with the prosecution of war activities and have been guilty of moral weakness and failure, is timely and doubtless will be appreciated by all who are conversant with the facts in the case. The Bishop is not the only one who has insinuated this. Both within and without the Church it has been often intimated that the ministers of God's Gospel have been uncertain and lethargic in their utterances and in their actions. These charges going unheeded by the clergymen themselves and by the Church papers, are liable to do real damage to the Church. The Clergy, firm in their own conviction that they have not been derelict as a class, and unconscience-stricken as to any "uncertainty" or "moral weakness" have not paid much attention to these insinuations and innuendoes. This silence serves to accentuate the unfair charge and to strengthen the idea that perhaps it is true after all!

Fully one-tenth of our own Clergy in the United States, I am informed, are in some form of war work. Practically all of the other class, with whom I have talked, ardently wish that they too were in some branch of the service. They, however, feel it their duty to remain at their posts where the work is no less important, though much less dramatic and picturesque. It was no less a warrior than King David who enunciated the theory that those who "stay by the stuff" should share equally in the rewards with those who go out into active service. It is after all hard to determine which requires the more stamina!

Every parson in the land who is worthy of his Captain is to-day sounding the clarion call to duty from his pulpit and from the rostrum. The nation is calling on the clergymen to be its spokesmen for the Red Cross, the Liberty Loan, the War Savings Stamps, and what not! And also for keeping up the morale of the people at home. And the parsons are doing it! Naturally the ministers are looked upon as the logical spokesmen on nearly all public occasions in these war times, as they and the barristers constitute practically the only class of people at all used to speaking in public. They are the organizers, the promoters and the inspirers in war campaigns of all kinds in thousands of cities and towns and hamlets all over the country. Of course, there are parsons who for one reason or another (or for no real reason at all!) do not take an active part in carrying on this gigantic struggle between the soldiers of God and the minions of Satan, but thanks be to God they are in a pitiable minority!

It is beyond me to keep silent in the face of these gratuitous charges. The Church will surely suffer for a long time to come if they are not refuted. I take it that I am more or less a typical representative of our Clergy, and to be concrete, let me state some of the war activities with which I happen to be connected, even though I do so at the risk of the charge of egotism and personal exploitation. I am connected with the local Council of Defense, the Legal Advisory Board, the Four-Minute Men, the War Savings Stamp and Liberty Loan campaigns, the Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. activities and I preach on spiritual aspects of the war with such persistence that someone recently expressed the wish that "the rector would stop preaching war sermons"! It would seem that everyone should realize by this time that this is a war for the preservation of all that is pure and holy and all that is Christian and godly, and what parson is there in the land who can fail to see that in furthering the cause of our country and our Allies he is furthering the cause of civilization and of humanity, and, therefore the cause for which the Church at its highest and best stands—for these are the things against which hell is arrayed and for which God has always stood. If right is always righteous and might is often unrighteous, this is indubitably a righteous war on the part of the Allies. It is, therefore, a war against evil and hell and for good and God. Those doing nothing to further the righteous cause, are doing much to further the unrighteous cause, whether they mean to do so or not—and the clergymen who fall in this category are contemptible (or else misguided) and few.

The Things I Miss.

An easy thing, O Power Divine,
To thank Thee for these gifts of Thine,
For summer's sunshine, winter's snow,
For hearts that kindle, thoughts that glow;

But when shall I attain to this?
To thank Thee for the things I miss?

For all young fancy's early gleams,
The dreamed-of joys, that still are dreams;
Hopes unfulfilled and pleasures known
Through others' fortunes, not my own,
And blessings seen that are not given
And ne'er will be, this side of heaven.

Had I, too, shared the joys I see,
Would there have been a heaven for me?

Could I have felt Thy presence near,
Had I possessed what I held dear?
My deepest fortune, highest bliss,
Have grown, perchance, from things I miss.

Sometimes there comes an hour of calm;

Grief turns to blessing, pain to balm;
A power that works above my will Still leads me onward, upward still;
And then my heart attains to this—
To thank Thee for the things I miss.

—Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

In His greatest parable Christ exalted the conception of the infinite blessedness of the family relationship, when He described the prodigal as cherishing an unappeasable yearning for the shelter and felicity of the home. Christ's theology is a transfiguration of the family. It is an implicit declaration that earth has no relationship which is nobler or more satisfying than that within its circle of affection and sacrifice.—Selected.

Whenever our Lord spoke, it was not that people might be pleased, but that they might be saved.

THE QUARANTINE: A MEDITATION.

The Rev. Percy T. Fenn, D. D.

For the first time in a ministry of nearly thirty years our people have been denied the privilege of public worship. The prevailing epidemic has compelled the Board of Health in this, and in thousands of other cities to take this step. And it has made us very serious.

We have a service of Intercession every Thursday afternoon, and last Thursday we knelt alone in the church, sang our usual opening hymn, without any accompaniment, said our prayers, and felt such a presence of God as we seldom feel when the church is full.

And from time to time during the quarantine we shall stand at the altar and pray, especially, that they and their dear ones may be kept in perpetual peace and safety. Most of our priests will do this; and what a comfort it ought to be to the Laity to know that we, their Clergy, have them in our hearts and are daily interceding for "those, who in this transitory life, are in trouble, sorrow, need, sickness or any other adversity."

But at a time like this, when the regular routine of life is being broken into, we are driven to reflection, and let us hope, to self-examination.

We look around us and we see that God's judgments are abroad in all the earth! And this conviction should make us sober.

Yesterday we buried a soldier who had died of the epidemic. He was a strong, hardy, splendid specimen of manhood, and he died in camp.

At the same hour, in this same city, another soldier was buried, with full military honors. He had died of the same disease in another camp!

Last night we received word that another soldier, who was once a chorister here, had died in Washington, and his body is to be brought here for burial.

And from day to day the telephone rings, and we are asked to offer special prayer for the recovery of those who are critically ill—some of our faith, some not of our faith.

The epidemic has not reached the proportions here that it has in other cities, so we may conclude that our own experience is precisely similar to that of most of our Clergy. It is an impressive experience, however, and it leads to sober thoughts.

For, it reminds us, very forcibly, of that incident in the life of God's chosen people, which is recorded in the twenty-fourth chapter of the second book of Samuel. David had sinned in numbering the people, and God permitted him to choose one out of three terrible instruments with which he and his people should be punished. They were offered seven years of famine, three months of war or three days of pestilence. And David chose the three days of pestilence.

Here, then, are three instruments, among many others, with which God chastens His rebellious children. And may we not believe that God is using two of these instruments to-day?

For more than four years the earth has been devastated by the most awful war that has ever occurred in its history, and men and women have been sobered wherever the moral and physical dreadfuls have been most apparent. But here and elsewhere the bulk of our people have scarcely been affected by it. When we gave up our boys we thought the parting would make us sober and that in our heart-agony we would turn to God,

But so far there has been little change in us, and we are practically just as indifferent and pleasure-loving as we were before the war. There are great apartment houses here in which not a single family—so far as we can discover—has any religious affiliation! Sunday comes and our congregations are even smaller than they were before the war.

The casualty lists are coming in, but they seem to make little, if any, impression upon us. We have a week-day service of intercession, and most of the parents and relatives of the boys at war are absent. We offer special prayer for them on Sunday, but usually many of the parents are absent. And we wonder at the heartlessness which permits, even requests us to offer prayer for their children when they refuse to, come to God's house to pray themselves!

The trouble is the Christian world has forgotten God. We are buried in pleasure, money-making, materialism of the grossest kind.

It is true that many of our people are working for the Red Cross, and are engaged to some extent in war activities; but they have lost their spiritual vision, and they feel little need of the consolations of our holy religion.

So the first instrument of judgment having failed, God is now using the pestilence that walketh in darkness, and the sickness that destroyeth in the noon-day! And the people are becoming impressed, thank God!

It may be that the impression will be transitory, and that many will fail to see the chastening hand of God in this epidemic. It may be that many will look upon it as a thing apart from God, and consequently this attitude will produce no repentance.

But we believe that the majority of our people will be quick to see that God is working among us, and when once they realize this they will be likely to seek His favor.

If, however, we shall refuse to recognize His judgments God may use other and more terrible instruments to bring us to Himself. For the great testing time is here, and we must face it.

To us, as to ancient Israel, God is saying to-day, "When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness, that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive."

Let us listen to His voice, and, turning to Him with the beauty of penitence, let us cry:

"O God, whose nature and property is ever to have mercy and to forgive; receive our humble petitions, and though we be tied and bound with the chain of our sins, yet let the pitifulness of Thy great mercy loose us; for the honor of Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Advocate. Amen."

SPONSORS IN BAPTISM.

The Rev. G. M. Brydon.

The question was put recently to a minister in one of our parishes if it would be wise to baptize the children of a certain family. The environment in which the children lived was bad, the moral atmosphere was unfavorable to Christian training. The older people in the home belonged nominally to a denomination which does not believe in infant baptism, and the request to have the children baptized was made in ignorance of the real meaning of that sacrament. It seemed very clear that if the children were baptized, unless it was to be merely a form gone through with and forgotten, the Church itself must undertake the duty of seeing that the children were trained up in the principles of Christian faith and living.

The question brings its own answer: That is just what the Church is for; to grasp its opportunities of carrying the gospel into needy lives, and to provide for the training of the children whom it brings to its Lord.

Indeed a case of this kind brings clearly into sight the purpose of the Church in providing that at every baptism of an infant, sponsors shall be provided who shall be responsible to the Church of God for the spiritual upbringing of the child. It is the responsibility of the Church, and not merely the duty of the parents that the child should be so trained. In this case the parents are unequal to the task, and the Church must see to it that the children are trained aright. Then the parish must select some of its godly members, and appoint them sponsors for the children, emphasizing the fact that to them is committed by the Church the duty of seeing that the children are trained up to lead godly and Christian lives; that their sponsorship is to be not merely a temporary act, but the acceptance of a duty which they must carry upon their consciences and hearts from day to day.

After all, this is just what the Church intends in every baptism, even if the child belongs to the most godly family in the community. An underlying fact is that the Church, acting through the parish and its minister in admitting the child by baptism into God's Kingdom, accepts the responsibility of its spiritual training. Therefore the parish appoints the sponsors as persons selected by the Church, to whom this responsibility is delegated for the parish.

And yet in our common practice this whole idea is utterly lost or ignored. It is the parents who as a rule select the sponsors for the child, and neither parents, sponsors, nor the parish itself realize that the Church is committing to these sponsors a tremendous and a most blessed opportunity of service. On the contrary, the sponsors are selected for reasons of personal liking, or as a little compliment to the one selected. It may be that the proposed sponsor is not even a communicant of the Church, or a member of any other Christian body; or has drifted away from the Church and never attends; and such an one is asked to make the solemn vows of baptism for a little child, and promise before God and the Church to raise the child to lead a godly and a Christian life.

We need a reform all along the line in our use of sponsors. It is, of course, proper that the parents of a child should have the privilege of selecting sponsors, but it is the duty of the Church acting through its minister to appoint to this duty those who have been selected. The minister must appoint, or refuse to appoint if the persons selected are not fitted for such responsibility. It is the Church which must decide as to fitness, as the sponsors are the appointed agents of the Church.

There is in many a parish some godly man or woman who is always depended upon to act as sponsor. There is a child to be baptized, and the family doesn't know much about the Church. The minister or some member of the Church has urged that the child be baptized, and the parents are willing. Then this usual member of the Church is called upon again to stand as sponsor, as a form which must be observed. After a while the parish register will show that such an one has stood as sponsor for five, ten, fifteen children, and doesn't even remember the names of all of them. In each case the sponsorship has been considered an accomplished and finished event, after the entry has been made on the record.

Suppose instead of this, there should be a few selected persons in a parish, selected for their fitness of character, and imbued with a sense of the sponsors' responsibility and privilege, who would have some sort of acknowledged position in the parish as a group of persons selected by the parish to act for the Church in the cases of children who are brought in from outside the Church's immediate congregation. They could make their sponsorship a real vital power in the lives of children of inadequate spiritual opportunity, whereas under our present methods the baptized child is apt to be overlooked or ignored. Certainly the "chance" sponsor does not assume the duty that he has undertaken of acting for the parish in keeping an oversight of the spiritual growth of the child.

A MESSENGER FROM AMERICA WITH THE ARMY OF BELGIUM.

By Charles S. Macfarland, Commissioner to France of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

For four years Belgium's brave little army has hardly moved out of those awful trenches of mire and clay. In the historic days of 1914 they stood between the liberties of Europe and the ruthless power that would have violated every other human right, as it did its solemn treaty with the courageous little nation which blocked its way to the satisfaction of its lust for power.

There they stand to-day almost in the same spot. Their trenches are in the soft mud, they are surrounded by inundated fields, only the little river Yser separates them from the German guns. (This was written, doubtless, before the recent Belgian advance.—Ed.)

At the headquarters where King Albert lives close by his army, on the morning when I gave him the message of Christians in America to his army, he said, "I want you, as a messenger of the American churches, to go to our trenches, to see with your own eyes what our men have endured. Their families are all under the German yoke, they have no homes that they can visit. They have been right there where they are, in the mud, for four long years, and they will stay right there until justice and freedom in the world are forever secured."

Have these men endured and suffered without religion?

Still less even, than the French army have they had the support of those great institutions for moral and spiritual support which have followed our boys from their first day in camp. But they have not been left alone, Cardinal Mercier's spirit has been abroad in their midst.

For the first time, near the beginning of the war, Protestant chaplains have found a place in the Belgian army. There are only a few thousand Protestant soldiers, but their chaplains know every one of them by name and location. Doubtless the same faithful service has obtained among the Roman Catholic chaplains, but on my short visit I had no opportunity for conference or observation, except through my contact with the Protestant chaplains.

First of all, young King Albert is a man of religious spirit and faith. After my little visit with him I called upon his adjutant, his military adviser and right hand man, who lives under the same roof. I found an open Bible on his desk. He happens to be a Protestant and a very earnest student of the Scriptures. He was as desirous to learn about America's religious life as he was about her army and resources.

Coming as the messenger of Protestant Christians, accompanied by the chaplain-in-chief of the Protestant chaplains, we were both formally and graciously welcomed by the Belgian Minister of War at headquarters and by the Ministers of State and Justice and the Prime Minister at the sea of the government in Havre. We spent several hours at lunch and in the home of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who was deeply interested in learning about our American religious life and institutions.

The Belgian government proposes shortly to send the Protestant chaplain-in-chief of the Belgian army to America to tell the American churches about the Belgian army and its religious life.

The Y. M. C. A. has not yet found its way into the Belgian army. But they have heard of it, they want it and a beginning is just being made. The Belgian generals and commandants, all of whom were met at their various headquarters, were deeply interested to learn about our Y. M. C. A., and expressed their hope that the Foyers du Soldat might become a part of their army.

I went through five or six miles of those trenches, I looked across the Yser and saw the German dugouts in the ruins of once beautiful Dixmude, I tramped over the ruins of Nieuport, where not a wall over six feet high is standing, I saw the marks of the rapacity, desolation and wantonness of the ruthless enemy, I saw those patient men pumping the mud and water out of their trenches and strengthening the banks that were between their underground bed-chambers and the over-drowning Yser. The shells were shrieking over our heads by day and the German airplanes dropped their deadly bombs by night. Gas masks must be ever at hand.

So it has been, when at its very best, for four years. There they are, the same men. They have thus resisted a gigantic enemy for a great ideal.

Old General Leman, aged, and weak from his long imprisonment in Germany, from which he had just been released, after he had told me of the defense of Liege, and after reading the Christian message I had given the king, talked for an hour about the religious subjects he had studied while a prisoner in Germany.

There is just a little danger that in the new relationships of friendship between the two greater nations, France and America, little Belgium and the days of 1914 may be forgotten. There is a religious faith and life in Belgium to be interpreted and expressed.

As one of the Belgian national leaders expressed it to me, "We want, in the days to come, to reveal and express, clearly to ourselves, those ideals which have maintained us in war and we must do it in the form of religion. We hope that America may help us in this as in other ways."

Those days in the Belgian trenches, sad as were the sights around us, gave me a new vision and a new faith in the people of this little nation. They, too, are ready for a religion of freedom.

In the work of saving the world God wants the help of every Christian.

THE MINISTRY AND UNITY.

From the Convention Address of the Bishop of Cuba.

* * * This world struggle has made us more keenly alive to the insufficiency of a divided Christianity. A united Church, we are told, might have prevented the war. I am not so sure about that, but I am sure that a divided and warring Christianity will have little influence on the terms of peace.

If Christian people as a body are to have any wide influence in determining the conditions of human unity, they will have to come together in a more perfect unity themselves. Hence the increasing demands among Christian people of all kinds for Church unity. But what kind of unity is it that we want in the Church? Is it an, automatic unity imposed upon us from without, or the free inner unity of the spirit? It is the unity of the spirit for which we must strive; if we can get that, then the outer unity will come in good time. Without that, outer unity would be merely mechanical, repressive and deadening.

For what purpose did Christ institute His Church? That it continue His work here on earth—spread the Kingdom of God and be the representative and embodiment of that Kingdom. This was to be the work of the whole Church, not of any one class in the Church. But that the work might be better done He gave it leaders, not rulers, but representative leaders. In view of the obscurity of the early history of the Church, it will not do to dogmatize too much about the method of their appointment, but we can at least be sure of this, that they were not appointed for their own advantage, but for the good of the body.

If we will transfer our attention from the method of appointment of the Christian ministry to the business of the ministry, that for which it was appointed, one fruitful source of misunderstanding will be sidetracked.

* * * The ministry was not instituted for its own benefit. "As my Father has chosen me, so I have chosen you and ordained you, that you should go and bring forth fruit and that your fruit shall remain."

"Whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister, and whosoever will be chief shall be servant of all."

We were elected for a purpose, and the official ministry has been kept alive for that purpose. We are here to bring men to Christ, and through Christ to God.

We have received this gift for use, not to claim any monopoly of Divine Grace. However full and complete our authorization may be, God has given us no exclusive rights to the means of salvation. He has provided certain channels through which He pours Himself into humanity. But He does not restrict Himself to the use of those channels. He has many resources at His command. We will not have any commanding influence in saving the world simply because we are in the line of the official ministry; that only gives us our opportunity; to trust to that alone is fatal.

Years ago the inhabitants of Jerusalem felt that because they possessed the temple of the Lord they were secure. How could anything happen to Jerusalem! Had not God chosen it for His particular abode? Was it not hallowed by the presence of His temple? Confident in the possession of such a talisman they could do as they pleased, secure in the protection of the Almighty. This spirit was rebuked by the prophets, who warned them that they could not cry, "The temple, the temple," and think that that could save them; and in the end the temple in which they trusted was destroyed and they were carried away captives.

However sacred, and authoritative, and valid they may be, our Orders will not do our work for us. We were not ordained to a monopoly of the means of salvation, not that we might claim the exclusive privilege of dispensing the means of grace, so that if any one wanted to be saved he must come to us.

We were ordained to the ministry. We were called to be servants, not given any exclusive privilege, but given an opportunity of serving the world in the highest possible way. It is our privilege to purify and keep pure the springs of life.

We are to forget ourselves and our own interests that the good news of the salvation of humanity through Jesus Christ may be given to men, may be brought home to them and appropriated by them; so that each man may enter into personal relations with God, and through God into proper relations with his brother man. All our ecclesiastical machinery must have this in mind or it is worthless.

* * * This is the ministry to which we are called, and as long as we give ourselves up to it with a full measure of devotion we need have no fear of rebuke.

But when the official ministry neglects its duty * * * then God finds some other means for carrying on His work. He is not shut up to the ministry He originally provided. He who out of these stones could raise up children to Abraham, can raise up another ministry to do His work.

That is what has happened. When the official ministry has settled down content to monopolize and enjoy its privileges, God has raised up another ministry of the Spirit to take up the task which for the moment the older ministry has neglected.

This is what happened in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and God raised up the Friars to do the neglected work of teaching and ministering. It happened again in England in the fourteenth century, and Wicliffe established bands of lay preachers to do the necessary work. It was especially characteristic of the end of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century in Western Europe. When the official ministry tried to use its monopoly of the accepted means of grace, to enrich itself without rendering any return in the way of spiritual effort. And the result was the great outbreak of the Reformation, when the work that the officials of the Church had neglected was undertaken by others.

In England, in the eighteenth century the Clergy once more had settled down to a condition of ease and contentment, respectable, kindly, well meaning, but absolutely devoid of any religious enthusiasm, contented to minister to the people who came to church, and largely indifferent to the multitude without, and then God raised up Wesley and the Wesleyans to do the necessary work.

In the United States at the beginning of its history, the Clergy were not indifferent, but were utterly inadequate to the task. People poured out in great numbers to the West. The Methodist and other itinerant preachers followed them and ministered to them, doing the work the Church's ministry could not do.

If we must recognize the splendid work which has been done in building up the Kingdom of God through the ministry of these men, of what avail, then, is it to belong to the Apostolic ministry? Much every way. Through that ministry the Bible, the Sacraments, the great body of religious and spiritual teaching have come down to us. This is the historic ministry, and so in ideal, at least, the ministry to the whole body of believers. It has seen all the changes which have passed over the world and the Church during the past eighteen centuries. It has an historic sense, its temper ought to be one of balance and sanity, as it judges things from a background of eighteen hundred years. It has a wonderfully rich and inspiring heritage. In one sense all the riches of the Christian past are the heritage of all Christian people, by whatever name they may call themselves. But those of us who belong to the historic ministry may claim a peculiar, though not exclusive, right to them. We are in the line of succession. Every brave deed, every noble thought, every unselfish act of the leaders of the past belongs to us.

These are no small advantages which we enjoy. They ought to be a great inspiration. Are we in the Apostolic line? Then we must do Apostolic deeds. Do we desire to have the people recognize our ministry? Then we must go to them, not making great claims, but doing great deeds of service. If we can bring men and women of God, if we can teach little children the meaning of their baptism, and slowly awaken in them a sense of their divine parentage, if we can build up Christian communities, where the weak and the poor and the ignorant have a chance, if in these ways we spread the Kingdom of God on the earth, we need have no fear but that our ministry will be sought. The way to recognition is not to make claims but to do the work.

If we would but set ourselves to prove our ministry, forgetting every privilege we claim, simply giving ourselves up to doing the work of the Master, taking full advantage of all the gifts He has entrusted to our care, Word and Sacrament, and the treasures of the Christian heritage, there would then be no danger of the intrusion of another ministry. If we can but lead men to God the Church will grow, and, as a rule, if men find God in any Christian communion, they will make that communion their religious home for the future.

The Church of the future will be the Church which will minister most efficiently to the spiritual needs of the people. Our heritage will help us to do this if we take full advantage of it, but if we think it entitles us to make idle claims of a monopoly of the means of grace and to settle down content with what our fathers have done, it will be nothing but a delusion and a snare to us, as the equally splendid heritage of the Jews proved to be in the time of our Lord.

Has our ministry any advantage over that of other communions? Let us prove it by making more converts, by building up larger and stronger and better communities of Christian believers, by being more diligent in our work.

Do not let us think too much about the Church, nor direct all our efforts towards building it up. But let us think about spreading the Kingdom and make every effort to bring men into touch with Christ. The Church which forgets its own ecclesiastical interests in devotion to its duty will tie men unto it with bonds which can never be broken.

At times it looks as though we were so much occupied in protecting and saving the Church from error that we have no time or strength left for the real work of the ministry. Instead of trying to get men in, we want to read men out because they don't agree with us. We are so afraid of making mistakes that we do nothing.

We are fond of saying that we keep the balance true in this Church between the two opposing principles of freedom and authority. There are two kinds of balance. There is one kind which is perpetually hung up in the middle never doing anything, like the ass in the fable, unable to choose between two equally desirable loads of hay, and so starving to death. In our fear to move and give up our conservative position we too often try to maintain that kind of a balance.

The other is the balance of perfect adjustment. Each part doing its own work well, and all working together without friction, so that the entire organism is able to accomplish results easily. This is the balance for which we must strive, and especially so in our ideas of the ministry. We must give up the idea of opposing and competing ministries, for that means that we try to neutralize each other's work. Let us each try to make the most of his own ministry with a glad recognition of the fact that God has all the resources at His command, and uses many means for the accomplishment of His Divine purposes.

This will not mean shutting our eyes to error, or giving up anything with which God has entrusted us. It will mean speaking the truth in love. It will mean a recognition of the fact that God has not bestowed all His gifts on us. We all desire and expect the ultimate knitting together of the different Christian communions in one great organic whole. When we are ready for this, God will give it to us.

But while organic unity may not at present be within our grasp, we can prepare the way for it by knowledge and sympathy, and a recognition of the value of each other's work. This must come before the whole body of Christian people is joined together in one outward organism.

The world faces a crisis. This is one of those periods when humanity is in a fluid and impressive state. What takes place now will determine the character of the next age. The great body of humanity, bruised and broken and wounded is realizing as never before its essential unity. It is struggling to bring about a more perfect outward expression of that unity. Two warring ideals of unity are battling with each other; each striving to mould the body of humanity in accordance with its own ideas. One would cast it into the mould of autocracy, impressing upon it the outward stamp of government from outside. The other would shape it from within, leading it through self-development until at last it assumes the form of the freedom of the sons of God; each individual and each nation developed to the utmost and all knit together into the bonds of a common service.

If we Christian people can forget the little things which divide us; if each one will give himself up to the great work of the ministry, we will find that we will all be working for the same end, and that though working independently, yet because we are all following the guidance of the Holy Spirit, we are working in harmony. Then we will be able to work from within humanity and so strengthen and enlarge and fortify its soul, that the spirit of freedom, which is the Christian spirit, shall conquer in the contest. Then will the unity come for which we are struggling, both in Church and State, not as the result of an iron rule imposed upon us from without, but as the result of the full and free development of each individual soul, gladly acquiescent to the will of God, each striving to make himself great in order that he may more greatly serve, and all knit together in bonds thin as silk and strong as steel, the bonds of a common service and a common fellowship.

The Great Commission

On the Long White Trail.

In the backlands of Labrador the Rev. S. M. Stewart came upon a huge stone woman that the natives worshipped as their god, and strange and horrible practises were carried on at their worship. These Eskimos had never heard of the Christian's God. Through an interpreter he talked to them and taught them what the true religion really is.

This was eighteen years ago. There is no stone woman there now, but there is the little Church of St. Stephen's. Mr. Stewart had had the Scriptures written for them in the Cree language. The "syllabic" characters were chosen for them, being the easiest way, and in about a month they had learnt to read and write.

In Ungava there was great difficulty in finding material for a house. So Mr. Stewart picked up drift-sticks along the coast. This made the framework, and over this he nailed some felt. For windows he used old photo plates.

To travel to his different stations he uses the "Eskimotor," a ten-dog sleigh, and has traversed thousands of miles over ice fields. To begin with, his parish extended a hundred miles along the Newfoundland coast and fifty miles of the coast of Labrador. Sometimes he missed his way, and when darkness came he had to put up somewhere for the night. Once he slipped down the slope of a hill into a huge ice fissure. At any moment the blocks might have crushed him, but he managed with God's help to climb up to the top in safety.

On one occasion, going towards the coast he halted at Tukutuk, where he knew there was a whole-souled body of Christians. He was anxious to give them a service of the Holy Communion—but where? Some had their home in a boat turned upside down; some in a skin tent; some in a tiny snow hut.

So several of the men went down to the beach and they built a good sized snow-house. Mr. Stewart writes thus of it: "Our Holy table with its fair linen cloth was a block of pure white snow. Twelve faithful souls united with me in this happy, helpful service, receiving their first communion. Families of several generations were present."

Another time it was to a forest encampment that he went. Trees are notched and barked, showing the way. The natives always examine these notches to see if they tell of where food has been "cached." They know when they may help themselves. Sometimes they don't touch it for they read in the Cree writing, "Belongs to an old man. Thou shalt not steal."

Mr. Stewart went with them from tree to tree, hoping that he might add something to do them good, such as "Jesus died for thee. Are you afraid to die?" "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved."

Ten years ago a large number of Eskimos landed at Port Chimo. They had endured great hardships and the parents of two children had died. Some relatives took the little girl, and Mr. Stewart adopted the little boy, teaching and training him, so that in time he became able to help in the day school. He went with the missionary on his travels, and at St. John's he was baptized by the Bishop with the name of Matthew. He had a three years' course in the Bishop Field College. To his good friend's joy he then began assisting him in all his work.

After the outbreak of this great war Mr. Stewart writes that coal on the Labrador coast amounted to $100 a ton, while letters from his friends in Britain take from five to six months to reach him.

Mr. Stewart's coat is made of the feathers of a seabird, used by Eskimos for winter dress.

Notes From the Missions House.

In writing of the agricultural school among the Moros in the Philippine Island of Jolo, the Rev. R. T. McCutchen points out that while the Mohammedan is rather suspicious of his new neighbors he is very quick to appreciate the value of the training which the boys are receiving. Any one familiar with the indolent habits of these natives would be surprised at the progress the school has been able to make in the short period of its existence. At the beginning, many of the boys left rather than work, but later returned and have grown from thin, listless individuals to be stout, robust boys taking great interest in all sorts of athletics, farm work and even in their academic studies. The influence of the school is being felt throughout the community in which it is situated. The parents visit the boys at frequent intervals and familiarize themselves with modern methods, and have taken away the seeds of fruit and vegetables, and a great many bushels of seed corn. The Moro is exceedingly slow to adopt new ideas or friends, and so it will take time to change his ways. He is, however, interested when he sees results, and will try to imitate.

Boone University, Wuchang, China, has opened a number of Sunday-schools throughout the city which are taught by the students. Wherever it is possible a Sunday-school for girls has been opened in the same section of town where there was one for boys. The girls' schools are taught by the women members and friends of the mission staff. Gatherings of all the schools are held at the university every year. The Rev. A. A. Gilman, the president of the university, points out that the great problem they will soon face will be the shepherding of many, both children and adults, who will be gathered for baptism in this new effort which has become a regular department of the university life.

Dr. A. W. Tucker, of St. Luke's Hospital, Shanghai, and Dr. C. M. Lee, of St. Andrew's Hospital, Wushih, have gone to join the Red Cross Unit which has been organized in Siberia by Dr. Teusler, of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo. Bishop Graves writes: "Dr. Teusler called for volunteers and our two doctors were the first to offer. Dr. McCracken and Dr. Petit will cut short their vacations to enable us to carry on here. Our nurses wanted to go, but I had to decide against it. Somebody must stay here. I wish I could go myself!"

St. Augustine's School, Raleigh, N. C.

A vocational unit of the Students' Army Training Corps will be established at St. Augustine's School, in combination with Shaw University, in Raleigh, N. C., for colored students eighteen years of age and over who have completed the public elementary school or its equivalent, and can pass the required physical and medical examinations. Those inducted into this unit will receive from the government board, lodging, instruction, uniforms and $30 a month pay. They will be given an opportunity to demonstrate their fitness for advancement and for qualifying for officers' and non-commissioned officers' schools.

As the number is limited applications should be made at once, stating age and previous schooling and giving references to the principal of St. Augustine's School, or to the President of Shaw University, Raleigh, N. C.

St. Augustine's School is endeavoring to raise an adequate endowment during this year, in which she is celebrating her fiftieth anniversary.

A number of Auxiliaries and Sunday-schools and other friends of the school have already contributed or pledged Liberty Bonds for the purpose. We earnestly hope that others will follow their example, and thus help to put the school on a firm financial basis.

Bonds or pledges may be sent directly to the Rev. Dr. A. B. Hunter, Raleigh, N. C., who is the treasurer of the Fund, or to the principal, the Rev. E. H. Gould, or through the Treasurer of the American Church Institute for Negroes, Mr. William Fellowes Morgan, 416 Lafayette Street, New York, New York City.

United Offering.

The attention of the custodian of every parish branch, and of every woman holding one of the little blue boxes, is earnestly called to the fact that but one year remains before this voluntary offering is collected at the next triennial, which meets in Detroit October, 1919.

All custodians are requested to have the offerings for this year sent to me by November 2.

The united offering has steadily grown from year to year, and we must not fail this time, with the need of the great work for the Master's cause more urgent than ever. The money so far collected is showing a decrease.

This united offering supports over 300 women workers, who are our substitutes for the command to "Go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," and is as binding to us as it was to the disciples twenty centuries ago.

Lieutenant Edward Le B. Goodwin, surgeon United States Army, the eldest son of the editor of the Southern Churchman, died at his post of duty at Fort Niagara, N. Y., October 10, 1918. Death was caused by pneumonia. Interment was made at Wytheville, Va., on Saturday, October 12.

The Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Winchester, has entered the Training School for Chaplains, Camp Taylor, Louisville, Ky.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thompson, D. D., Suffragan.

Convocation Southwest Virginia.

The one hundred and third Convention of the Convocation of Southwest Virginia met at St. Thomas Church, Christiansburg, Va., October 1 to 3. There were sixteen Clergy in attendance. The meeting was characterized by great earnestness and devotion.

On Tuesday morning the Dean, the Rev. F. H. Craighill, preached a sermon; that night the Rev. T. F. Opie was the preacher.

The Convocation sermon was preached on Wednesday morning by the Rev. J. W. C. Johnston, after which the Holy Communion was celebrated. The Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, Bishop Suffragan, preached Wednesday night and confirmed a class of two.

As usual, Thursday evening services were devoted to missions. The speakers were the Rev. G. Wallace Ribble on "General Missions"; the Ven. A. Vaughn Colston on "Diocesan Missions." At this service Bishop Tucker presided and introduced the speakers.

The practical essay was read by the Rev. G. Otis Mead on "Teacher Training of the Sunday-school," calling attention of the Convocation to the drive throughout all communions in the United States and Canada for teacher training and emphasizing its necessity, especially in preparation for the work during and following the war. The theoretic essay was read by the Rev. Claudis F. Smith on "Christian Unity as a Result of the War." This was a scholarly paper, presenting the great subject in a broad and sane light. Many participated in the discussion and made it one of the leading features of the whole Convocation.

The devotional meetings on Wednesday and Thursday held at 9:30 A. M. were conducted by the Rev. J. B. Dunn, D. D., on the general subject, "Of the Promises of the Dawn," developing thought that the spirit of man is the power working through soul and body.

During the business sessions of the Convocation a resolution was passed endorsing the Diocesan paper edited by the Rev. G. Wallace Ribble, promising co-operation in his endeavors to make it a real force of the Diocese.

The matter of maintaining the missionary work of the Diocese came in for a general review, and the Convocation urged the use of the Advent Mite Boxes to gather money for this purpose. Quite a good deal of routine business was transacted, and the following were the appointees for the next meeting, which is to be held at Pulaski: Devotional leader, the Rev. T. D. Lewis, Sweet Briar; Convocation preacher, the Rev. J. F. Burkes; writer of the theoretic essay, the Rev. T. K. Nelson; practical essay, the Rev. T. F. Opie.

Subject of the theoretical essay selected by Convocation for next meeting is "The Church in Relation to the Social Conditions After the War."

The Convocational Board of Religious Education was elected and composes the following:

Rev. Messrs. T. D. Lewis, T. C. Faulkner, T. F. Opie, C. F. Smith, G. O. Mead.

The rector of the church at Wytheville expressed a desire to have the Summer Normal School in his parish, and it was unanimously decided to hold the sessions of the Summer Normal at that place the week after the public schools close next summer.

The people of Christiansburg were most bountiful in their hospitality, and the members of the Convocation enjoyed to the fullest the delightful three days' stay in their midst.

To the Members of the Woman's Auxiliary, Diocese of Southern Virginia.
My Dear Friends and Co-Workers:

On account of the epidemic of influenza now prevailing over the State, the annual meeting of our Auxiliary, which was to have been held in Christ Church, Roanoke, last week, was postponed—the Board of Health of that city advising that no conventions be held there whilst this epidemic continues.

It is a great disappointment to us all; as an unusually interesting and helpful meeting had been planned for, and Christ Church Auxiliary had arranged everything most thoughtfully.

I would urge all the members of the Auxiliary all over our Diocese daily to beseech our Heavenly Father, who has thought fit to visit us for our sins with this great sickness and mortality, in mercy and loving kindness to withdraw from us this grievous sickness with which we are afflicted, remembering that "prayer alone can move the hand that moves the world."

Faithfully yours,

LOULIE TAYLOR LETCHER,
Diocesan President.

The Annual Convention of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, which was to be held at Christ Church, Roanoke, has been postponed on account of the prevalence of influence throughout the State.

Richard Roberts, youngest son of Rev. and Mrs. W. T. Roberts, of Rocky Mount, Va., died of pneumonia at Sheffield, Ala., on Thursday, October 3, and was buried in Rocky Mount Sunday afternoon, October 6.

The Rev. A. Vaughn Colston has taken up work in and around Roanoke. He gives a service nearly every Sunday at St. Peter's Chapel, Roanoke, but also ministers at Buchanan, Fincastle and Grace Church in Botetourt, Amherst and Clifford in Amherst County.

The Rev. John G. Scott has accepted the rectorship of St. Luke's and Manakin churches, Powhatan County, where he has been rendering splendid service for two years.

Central Convocation has been indefinitely postponed on account of the epidemic of influenza.

During the epidemic of influenza, which is raging in Petersburg as elsewhere, the whole body of students of the Bishop Payne Divinity School has volunteered to serve as orderlies in the Emergency Hospital, and have been rendering most efficient and helpful service.

The meeting of the Central Convocation, which was planned to be held October 22-24, has been indefinitely postponed on account of the epidemic of influenza.

KANSAS.

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

Ordination.

On Sunday, October 6, in St. John's Church, Wichita, the Rev. Percy T. Fenn, Jr., who is the assistant at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Brooklyn, N. Y., was ordained to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Sidney C. Partridge, D. D., Bishop of West Missouri, acting for Bishop Wise, who had been compelled to go to the hospital in Topeka for a minor operation.

The candidate was presented by his father, the Rev. Dr. Fenn, rector of the parish, who also preached the sermon. Those assisting in the service were the Ven. Leonidas W. Smith, Archdeacon of Kansas; the Rev. Canon Hawkins, of Topeka; the Rev. Fred. C. Ruffe, of Newton, and the Rev. Alfred W. Pannell, of El Dorado. The service was most interesting and impressive because the candidate had grown up in the parish, and had been one of its choristers. The newly ordained priest was the special preacher at the evening service, and the day after he was the celebrant at a specially arranged service.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Requests That Services Be Held at Home.

The Bishop of Washington advises the people of the Diocese, bereft by request of the local government, because of the influenza, of the benefits of the Holy Communion, of public worship, and of preaching, to hold worship regularly, and especially on the Lord's day, in their own homes. For this purpose the services of Morning and Evening Prayer and the Litany are specially commended. Suitable printed sermons from private or public libraries, or procured from the rector of each parish, should be read aloud by a member of the household. In the prayers should be included those appointed for the sick, in time of great sickness and mortality, for those in affliction, as well as for the President, the Congress and the nation. The war prayers for our country, for our soldiers and sailors, for our Allies, for the wounded and dying, for the doctors and nurses, the Red Cross and other war workers, for victory and for peace, should be offered without fail daily. Psalms 23, 31 and 91 are suggested as of special help at this time in private and family devotions. Appropriate hymns may be sung where conditions permit.

And may God by His Holy Spirit strengthen and comfort us all in these days of trial, and give us the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ in the fullest measure.

Death of the Rev. Charles E. Buck.

The Rev. Charles E. Buck, for the past twenty years rector of Rock Creek parish, District of Columbia, died in Washington on October 2. Funeral services were held in St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek, Friday afternoon, October 4th, Bishop Harding, the Rev. J. W. Clark, the Rev. P. M. Boyden and the Rev. H. F. Cobey officiating. Nearly all of the Clergy of the Diocese in vestments took part in the service, and a large number of the people of Rock Creek and the Diocese were present. The interment was in the parish churchyard.

Mr. Buck was born in Baltimore and was educated at Charlotte Hall, St. John's College, Annapolis, and the Theological Seminary in Virginia. He was ordained deacon in 1877 by Bishop Whittingham, and priest in 1880 by Bishop Pinkney. Almost his entire ministry was spent in his native State, in its three Dioceses of Maryland, Easton and Washington. He was elected to the General Convention, to the Standing Committee and Diocesan Boards of Missions again and again and served as secretary of the two latter for many years. Mr. Buck held many offices in the Church's local institutions, his chief activity and care being the Episcopal Hospital, of whose Board of Governors he was executive head under the Bishop. He had long been planning to celebrate in 1919 the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of Rock Creek parish.

Mr. Buck leaves a widow, three sons and two daughters, all married, and numerous grandchildren. His wife, daughter of the Rev. J. W. Chesley, recently deceased, is one of the leaders in the woman's work of the Diocese.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Gore in Chattanooga.

The Rt. Rev. Charles Gore, D. D., D. C. L., Bishop of Oxford, was given a hearty welcome and rapt attention at the auditorium of the courthouse of Chattanooga on Saturday, October 5. Through the efforts of the Rev. W. L. Kinsolving, in behalf of St. Paul's Church, Bishop Gore altered his itinerary to include Chattanooga between Knoxville and Atlanta. His eloquent and spiritual ideals as he pled for the establishment of the League of Nations advocated by President Wilson, left a profound and lasting impression upon the audience of Chattanooga's most prominent citizens.

Judge Bachman, of the Supreme Court, introduced the speaker, and the Rev. W. C. Robertson, of Christ Church, and the Rev. Warner Forsyth, formerly of Richmond, Va., assisted in receiving the distinguished guest.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Annual Meeting Eastern Orthodox Churchmen.

Bishop Darlington, of Harrisburg; Bishop Parker, of New Hampshire, and the Rev. Dr. T. J. Lacey, of the Redeemer parish, Brooklyn, led in the welcome to Eastern Orthodox Churchmen in their annual meeting held here. Bishop Greer formally received the Metropolitan of Athens in the Cathedral on Sunday afternoon, where there was a great gathering of Greeks, Russians and even Bulgarians and others, and patriotism was at a high pitch, owing in part to war news of the day. The two Greek churches in the city held special services. In his address Bishop Greer was most emphatic in favor of Church unity, and most cordial in his welcome to the Greek prelate, who is here to adjust boundaries of Greek Church Dioceses, and consider election of new Bishops.

A second service was held in St. Michael's Church, and a conference in Synod Hall. Into the latter were put many expressions of patriotism, and many references to the part of Balkans in the adjustment of war questions. The split in the factions of the Russian Church was ignored, but preference expressed for the Americanization of that part of the Eastern Church that is hereafter to be here. The advice was general that the example of the Episcopal Church ought to be followed, in that an American Church should be set up, free of excessive ritual, using the English tongue, and there not be a perpetuation in America of the old Russian customs and ceremonies. The meeting closed with a dinner in Synod Hall, in honor of the Greek Metropolitan.

The Church of the Transfiguration, the Rev. Dr. G. C. Houghton, rector, celebrated on the first Sunday in October the seventieth anniversary of its founding.

Many churches provided desks in vestibules on Sunday last and sold Liberty Bonds before and after services.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Prominent Churchman.

Mr. Jacob Kleinhaus died recently at his home in Grand Rapids, after an illness of about six months. Mr. Kleinhaus was very active in the work of the Church, having represented the Diocese of Western Michigan at every General Convention since the convention in Cincinnati. He has also represented the Diocese at the meetings of the Fifth Missionary District, and also the Provincial Synod. He was on the Provincial Court of Appeals, and was considered an authority on the Canons of the Diocese.

Mr. Kleinhaus was one of the organizers of Grace Church parish, Grand Rapids, in 1875. He at that time was elected senior warden and has held the office continuously since. He was never absent from services unless ill or out of the city. For many years he was chancellor of the Diocese of Western Michigan and a member of the Standing Committee.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The Pittsburgh Street Service Movement.

Sunday afternoon, September 29, on the corner of Smithfield Street and Second Avenue, a noted and notorious down town center, under the auspices of the Episcopal churches of Pittsburgh, the closing of the sixth year of street services was held. The Rev. William Porkess, rector of Grace Church, Pittsburgh, presided, and the Rev. L. B. Whittemore, of Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, and the Rev. John Magee, a missionary on furlough from China, were the speakers. A very large gathering of men was present, proving one of the best attendances ever known. The personnel of these crowds has proved an interesting study. The bum and the degenerate have occasionally been seen. But the respectable, and in many cases the educated, have been present again and again in large numbers. No one knows where they come from, and no one knows where they go after each service. The intent look they have on their faces, while at the service, has been an inspiration to

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

SHALL WE RETAIN "CHARITY" AS THE NAME OF WELFARE ORGANIZATIONS.

The Survey of October 5 contains a very interesting article by Frédéric Almy, for twenty-five years Secretary of the Buffalo Charity Organization Society, on this question. Mr. Almy, by reason of his long and distinguished service in this field, is an authority on such a subject, and when he advocates abandoning the use of "charity" for welfare and uplift societies it should and will have great weight.

There is no doubt that this name has often prevented such organizations obtaining a maxim of usefulness by preventing many persons who really need assistance or council from applying for it on account of prejudice against the name charity.

Mr. Almy suggests that the title Family Welfare League would be a good substitute for organizations which have heretofore been known as "Associated Charities" or "Charity Societies."

He urges in this behalf the important fact that we now consider our "cases" from the point of view of the family more than that of the community.

We may follow members of one family through several communities in order to get them together or to secure employment for them; therefore the added emphasis on the family as the unit would certainly be helpful.

As a matter of fact, charity in the sense of the mere giving of money is very nearly a thing of the past.

Considering this question from the churches' point of view, it is interesting to remember that our Saviour, who spent his life helping others, never did so through charity.

He laid the emphasis upon the word neighbor, and gave us the incomparable illustration of true neighborliness in the conduct of the good Samaritan.

Also it is well to remember that the word "charity" as used in the King James' Version of the New Testament is almost invariably changed to "love" in the more correct and more modern translations.

PROBATION LAWS MAKING HEADWAY IN THE SOUTH.

At the last session of the Virginia Legislature a bill was passed providing for the appointment of probation officers in the various courts of the States. Such appointments to be made only upon recommendation of the State Board of Charities and Corrections.

In compliance with this law the judges of the Hustings Court and of the Police Court of Richmond, Va., have already appointed probation officers.

The next step towards modernizing the courts an effective law enforcement will be the provision for indeterminate sentences.

The present system of a fixed sentence for a specified crime is no more fair than it would be for a doctor to have a regular list "ten days in bed for pleurisy," "four weeks for pneumonia," "ten weeks for typhoid fever," etc.

The object in sending a man to jail is to cure him of the weakness of not realizing the importance of the difference between his property and some one else's, or to cure him of the weakness of giving away to a violent temper, or an insatiable appetite for strong drink. To decide arbitrarily that sixty days in jail will cure every man of petit larceny, or that thirty days in jail will cure every man of the habit of drinking, is just as foolish as it would be for a doctor to enforce such prescriptions as suggested above, whether his patients got well in the meantime or not.

On the other hand the indeterminate sentence system by which a man is sent to jail for an indefinite period, not specified by the judge, but determined by some qualified and properly trained court official, based upon the mental and moral condition of the prisoner, who, upon being released, is watched over and protected by a probation officer—affords an opportunity for the exercise of the same sort of judgment that the physician uses in deciding when his patients are strong enough to leave their beds.

This system has now been in operation in Indiana for twenty-five years, and its results in reformed criminals, as shown by careful records, fully justify its continuance.

AN OUTLET FOR OUR EAGERNESS.

Terrible as has been the devastation wrought by the epidemic that is sweeping the country, it has nevertheless its bright side. Probably no contagious disease ever struck the country at a time when people were so eager to render some sort of service.

The promptness with which educational buildings have been converted into hospitals and the alacrity with which persons from every walk of life have flocked to volunteer as nurses, orderlies, messenger boys or ambulance drivers, is largely due to the desire of the home people to prove themselves worthy of the boys in France.

We all want "to go over the top" in some way, and these improvised hospitals have been equipped in every way—at least ten times as rapidly as would have been the case a year ago, before the war had been so poignantly brought home to us.

Conventions no longer have the weight of normal times, and we look upon duties of a most unusual character as being quite natural and not at all out of the way when we remember that the flower of our youths may be digging trenches or building roads or making cocoa as Red Cross workers in France.

THINGS TO BEAR IN MIND.

In these days of rush and tear the following slogans, put forth by the National Safety Council, are well worth keeping before us:

Enlist now—we fight to save life, not take it.

Let's get safety "over the top."

A national ideal—our lives unstained by carelessness.

Safety saves sickness, suffering, sadness.

Put the skull and cross-bones label on carelessness.

Let us mold safety into public opinion.

Safety first is contagious—catch it. Wreckless—not reckless.

An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of compensation.

Make safe the highway for the throng.

War makes honorable cripples—carelessness unhonored ones.

Safety means more than property—it means life.

Our aim—safety on earth—in the air—by land and sea.

More men are killed by accidents than by war.

Safety is replete with human interest.

The Value of a Plan.

Every Christian life needs a plan—steady, well-kept, good all the year round—to give direction to all Christian efforts. Without a plan, we become fitful, zealous at one time, cold at another. Satan cannot conquer a Christian life that has a plan to live by. Our circumstances in life are very different, and by necessity the plans will be modified thereby; still, each one should realize the value of system, and arrange a method which accords with our vocation.

If you plan to go to church each Sunday, you will be there more regularly than if you leave it to be decided from time to time. Whatever you resolve to do will sometimes be difficult to perform, and you have saved your resolution if you can meet the difficulty with the response, "That's my plan," and follow it out. If we could read the records of human life, we would find that we have many times fallen into bad habits, neglected our duties, yielded to temptation, broken our good resolutions, simply because our Christian life was a kind of haphazard, go-as-you-feel sort of thing, and lacked a well-kept plan.—Gospel Advocate.

Twenty-second Sunday After Trinity:

The first Sunday morning lesson is the story of the remorse and death of Antiochus Epiphanes. Having failed in his attempt to despoil a wealthy city in Persia and then receiving the intelligence that the Jews had driven Lysias off and pulled down the abomination which he had set up upon the altar in Jerusalem, the king "was astonished and sore moved; whereupon he laid him down upon his bed and fell sick for grief, because it had not befallen him as he looked for." Realizing that his end was come, he called friends, to his bedside and made his lamentation and confession. "I remember the evils that I did at Jerusalem. . . . I perceive therefore that for this cause these troubles are come upon me and, behold, I perish through great grief in a strange land." While this experience does not illustrate the petition of the Collect for pardon and peace any more than his selfish military career bears out the thoughts of the Epistle, strength through Divine help and that warfare which is waged with the "sword of the Spirit," yet the selection is apposite as presenting the very opposite of those principles"; a wreck is as good as a lighthouse." It is a curious coincidence that Antiochus' story is opposite even to the Gospel for the day, in that he died instead of having been healed and restored.

For the second lesson we have given the first two chapters of 2 Thess., God's judgment upon the enemies of His Church at the coming of the Lord, which coming, however, is to be preceded by apostasy in the Church and the manifestation in the world of the mystery of lawlessness; "therefore, comfort your hearts and stablish you in every good word and work." The conflict of the Christian Church against sin within and without runs parallel with the experience of God's people of old during the Antiochian persecution.

The evening lessons are for the purpose of illustrating the "pardon and peace" of the Collect, and the peace in the midst of conflict of the Epistle. A woman of the city "which was a sinner," interrupted a dinner party at which our Lord was a guest. Standing at His feet and weeping, she washed His feet with her tears, wiping them with the hairs of her head and anointing them with ointment. The host, type of the gentleman who does not understand spiritual things, draws an inference unfavorable to the prophetic insight of his guest, all unconscious of his own discourtesy in omitting certain attentions due and ignorant of the great principles of love and forgiveness. The prophet read both the sinner's heart and his own (the greater sinner of the two). Pardon and peace were her portion. (Note: The woman loved because she had been forgiven, not vice versa.) The Old Testament passage is a prophecy of the time when Jerusalem (the Church) should be a "quiet habitation" and experience forgiveness. The humble, penitent sinner, rather than the proud Pharisee, "saw the King in His beauty." For week days, besides the continuation of Maccabees and Ecclesiasticus, Titus and II Timothy are given and the course reading begun of the Gospel of Him who brought, not the law under which Simon had been reared, but the "grace and truth" to which the "sinner" responded.

The marvel of God's love for mankind grows as we learn the degree of that love. It is the degree of it that is apocalyptic. The Old Testament had attempted to disclose the graciousness of God, telling men that like as a father pities, so God pities. Exterior nature too had tried to make known God's healing and comforting power; abundant harvests telling of His affection, zephyrs breathing His soothing kindness, health-giving air and the recuperative tendencies within every normal body indicating that love is over mankind. But the degree of that love was never known to any man, however scholarly, until it was revealed when God out of desire to secure to man the highest possible good gave His Son for man.—J. G. K. McClure.

Collect for Twenty-first Sunday After Trinity.

Grant, we beseech Thee, merciful Lord, to Thy faithful people pardon and peace, that they may be cleansed from all their sins, and serve Thee with a quiet mind; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Morituri te Salutant.

O Thou eternal One, we who are doomed to die lift up our souls to Thee for strength, for death has passed us in the throng of men and touched us, and we know that at some turn of our pathway he stands waiting to take us by the hand and lead us—we know not whither. We praise Thee that to us he is no more an enemy, but Thy great angel and our friend, who alone can open for some of us the prison house of pain and misery and set our feet in the roomy spaces of a larger life. Yet we are but children, afraid of the dark and the unknown, and we dread the parting from the life that is so sweet and from the loved ones that are so dear.

Grant us of Thy mercy a valiant heart, that we may tread the road with head uplifted and a smiling face. May we do our work to the last with a wholesome joy and love our loved ones with an added tenderness because the days of love are short. On Thee we cast the heaviest burden that numbs our soul, the gnawing fear for those we love, whom we must leave unprotected in a selfish world. We trust in Thee, for through all our years Thou hast been our stay. O Thou Father of the fatherless, put Thy arm about our little ones! And ere we go we pray that the days may come when the dying may die unafraid, because men have ceased to prey on the weak and the great family of the nations enfolds all with its strength and care.

We thank Thee that we have tasted the rich life of humanity. We bless Thee for every hour of life, for all our share in the joys and strivings of our brothers, for the wisdom gained which will be part of us forever. If soon we must go, yet through Thee we have lived and our life flows on in the race. By Thy grace we too have helped to shape the future and bring in the better day.

If our spirit droops in loneliness, uphold us by Thy companionship. When all the voices of love grow faint and drift away, Thy everlasting arms will still be there. Thou art the Father of our spirits; from Thee we have come; to Thee we go. We rejoice that in the hours of our purer vision, when the pulse throb of Thine eternity is strong within us, we know that no pang of mortality can reach our unconquerable soul, and that for those who abide in Thee death is but the gateway to life eternal. Into Thy hands we commend our spirit.—Walter Rauschenbusch, in "Prayers of the Social Awakening."

The Gifts of God.

God gave us life, and light, and love,
And for our home, this wide green earth,
Enriched by wondrous heights above
Where planets wheel, and stars have birth,

God gave our father, age to age,
His Golden Rule, His deathless truth,
Encarved on stone, inscribed on page,
And graven in the hearts of youth.

God gave our age a wider view,
A freer air, a lighter task,
Delights our fathers never knew Nor dreamed that heart of man could ask.

All these God gave of His good-will;
What have we given Him of ours?
A weakened faith, a love grown chill,
A handful, now and then, of flowers.

Impatience of His watchful care,
Doubts of His power to guide or bless,
A careless thought, thoughtless prayer,
And last of all, forgetfulness.

So, without guide, or faith, or hope,
We hasten through our aimless days,
Like those who, blind and frantic, grope
Through tortuous ways of some vast maze,

Where blind meets blind in senseless strife,
And knows not friend from deadly foe,
Yet to prolong a fruitless life
Each strives to strike the fatal blow.

Yet God still loves, forgives, and awaits
Until His wayward children turn
From fleeting joys and foolish hates,
And lift their eyes to Him, and learn.

As babes upon their mother's knee,
The wonders of His living truth.
Then God's great gift of peace shall be Guarded by age, revered by youth.
—Joy Caruthers, in Diocese of Chicago.

"More Generous Still."

"Oh, no, I can not take them. It would be robbing you, and I should be so uncomfortable. Thank you just the same. They are beautiful, but I want you to keep them."

Isabel spoke positively, and in her heart considered herself unselfish and thoughtful as she motioned back her friend Elsie's hand, holding out some of the beautiful flowers to her, which she had offered to share. Isabel did not see the look of disappointment on Elsie's face as she restored the blossoms which she had separated from the sheaf she bore. And it was only to herself, and, therefore, unheard by any listener, that the young girl whispered,
"I hardly ever have anything to give while Isabel is always doing pleasant things for me. I stopped on purpose to share these beauties, but she won't take them."

Elsie had been gone but a few minutes when Jamie, the youngest of the family, came in with beaming face and a sticky handful of something which he offered to his sister to taste.

"Take some candy," he said. "Boy next door gave it to me. I want you to take some 'fore I eat it up. You're always good to me, you know."

"I'd rather you would eat it all, Jamie, boy," said the big sister, turning away and leaving the room. Aunt Martha was sitting by the window, sewing—good, wholesome, sensible Aunt Martha, always a welcome visitor in the home. Jamie turned a disappointed face to her and turned a doubting step toward her. "Won't you have some, auntie?" he asked. "Yes, dear; give me a taste. I like candy." She helped herself sparingly, it is true, but the small boy ran from the room with a satisfied expression.

That evening the telephone rang.
"You are very good to offer to come so far out of the way for me," answered Isabel, "but I can't let you take all that trouble." After listening a minute, she spoke again. "Yes, it would be pleasant, but, really, it is too much for you to do. Don't think of it." And she hung up the receiver. Then she sat down to draw off a pattern for braiding which one of her friends had asked for.

"Why do you do that?" asked Aunt Martha, the only other occupant of the room just then. "It takes time, and is not anything you care for."

"But Jean wants it, and I like to do things for Jean. I heard her admiring this, and decided to give her the pattern as soon as I could," was the answer.

"How singular that you should care to do such favors," said Aunt Martha, with rather a curious emphasis. Isabel looked up, puzzled, and the expression deepened as Aunt Martha added: "I suppose few others enjoy it as you do."

"Just suppose that no one was willing to take favors, how could you have the pleasure of doing them? I know, Isabel, that you do enjoy doing things for people. I have always known that of you. But I have been impressed lately with your unwillingness to receive favors that are offered to you. You declined Elsie's flowers this morning.
You refused Jamie's little love-offering, and just now you evidently rejected a little plan some one devised for the evening."

"But, auntie, I am very sensitive about taking favors, because I can not bear to have others take trouble for me. I want to be unselfish about it, and"—hesitatingly—"I don't want to feel too much under obligation."

"But suppose that all your friends felt and acted as you do, what then?
Let me quote a favorite bit of verse that fits in, from Adelaide Proctor:

"I hold him great who, for love's sake,
Can give, with noble, generous will,
But he who takes for love's sweet sake,
I think I hold more generous still."

"Isn't it more generous to do the harder thing, and to be a gracious receiver, so that another may be a happy giver?"

"I never thought of that side of it," said Isabel, who was very thoughtful now.

"But there has to be the taking side
as well as the giving side, my dear girl.
And as a kindly acceptance is a more difficult grace than a kindly bestowal, ought we not to be even more careful to do that than the other, though gracious giving is essential, too?"

"Yes, Aunt Martha," assented Isabel, heartily, adding slowly: "Perhaps my reluctance to be under obligation is more pride than unselfishness, after all."—Julia H. Johnston, in Presbyterian.

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

VIII. The Spacious Firmament on High.

Hymns differ almost as greatly as do human beings; each has its peculiar personality, its special intrinsic worth.
Some hymns are bugle calls, some are meditations, intimate and sweet; some are songs of praise, some upward-breathing, articulate prayers; some tell of inward experiences, some celebrate outward occasions. One that is in a manner unique, that seems somehow to stand just a little apart from all the rest, is Addison's great nature hymn.
This composition has for its subject the testimony that nature bears to nature's divine Original, and so powerfully does that testimony speak in every line that no one can read it carefully to the end without a feeling of solemn awe.

Joseph Addison, the author, is one of the great names of English literature. He has been called, indeed, "the well of English undefiled." Chiefly remarkable as a writer of prose, he, nevertheless, won much fame as a poet.
Perhaps nothing that he ever wrote exceeded in literary worth this wonderful hymn that the Church has taken to herself.

Like so many other makers of hymns,
Addison was the son of a clergyman.
Though he died at the early age of forty-seven, his comparatively brief career was rich and full. Honors came to him easily. He knew the meaning of adversity, but he knew also what it was to achieve wealth, popularity, and brilliant distinction through his own efforts.

In the so-called Queen Anne period in which he lived, spirituality in England was not at high tide. We can have no warrant for thinking of Addison as an especially spiritually-minded man; possibly even in those days he could scarcely have been called religious. All the more, therefore, and with bright vividness, does his hymn bear testimony to the great truth that it sets forth. It is as though the man had been impelled by a power outside of himself to proclaim the wonders of God in creation. The lines are full of sonorous beauty; they move as majestically as the procession of the stars.
They produce a wonderful effect; when we sing them we feel dwarfed before Omnipotence, yet at the same time com-fortingly and singularly safe.

The spacious firmament on high,
And all the blue, ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaim.
The unwearied sun, from day to day,
Does his Creator's power display,
And publishes to every land
The work of an Almighty Hand.

Soon as the evening shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale,
And nightly to the listening earth
Repeats the story of her birth;
Whilst all the stars that round her burn,
And all the planets in their turn,
Confirm the tidings as they roll,
And spread the truth from pole to pole.

What though in solemn silence all
Move round his dark terrestrial ball;
What though no real voice nor sound
Amidst their radiant orbs be found;

In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice;
Forever singing, as they shine,
"The Hand that made us is divine."

Inventing Life.

One who had watched the education of youth for many years with kindly wisdom used to say that the most pathetic thing about it was that the young were so incapable of profiting by the experience of age. You try to teach your children the sad lessons that you have plucked from life, to make them distinguish between sweet and bitter, to choose this path and to avoid that; but they will neither obey nor listen. They stumble over rough roads that you would have made smooth and fall into traps that you would have had them shun.

But if this makes the pathos of youth it also makes its charm, this petulant indifference to the gray caution of mistrustful age. The boy and the girl go bounding forward over hill and valley, eager to make life for themselves, to create a new world. What if you have failed? Is that any reason why they should not succeed? Even sorrow, even suffering, even death are rich with splendid, untried possibilities. But these children do not think of sorrow, or suffering, or death. It is enough for them that tomorrow is unlimited. For them are all the vast desire and hope of Stevenson's delicate verses:

The world is so full of a number of things,
I'm sure we should all be as happy as kings.

And their vivid impatience finds its natural outlet in the panting enthusiasm of Rosalind, "One inch of delay more is a South Sea of discovery."

In the gay French comedy the old lady says of the young girl, "Here is another one who thinks she has invented love." So we may say of youth, "Here are others and others and others by the million who think they have invented life."

And the tragedy of advancing years is that we invent life no longer. As we grow old, everything grows old about us. Well-trodden paths lead to old, familiar haunts, haunts often loved because they are familiar, but still old, with nothing of discovery, nothing of wonder, nothing of mystery. "When I was a boy," said the wise man, "the path by the high hedge enthralled me. What wondrous things might be on the other side! To be sure, there was nothing on the other side, but I did not know it. Now, alas! I can look over and see."

But there are a fortunate few whose eyes are bright with discovery until they die. Let us all be as much like them as we can. Let us resolutely go on inventing life. The surest way to do that is to live with the spirit of the young, to see life with their eyes, and, in these days when we are so madly on the watch against evil germs, to keep our souls daily infected with the germ of wonder.—The Youth's Companion.

Foreign Mission Evangelism.

Evangelistic work seems not to have been retarded by the war. The mass movement in India continues with unabated vigor. The united campaign in Japan, which closed a few months ago, was the most successful campaign ever carried on by a native church in all its history. At present a great evangelistic campaign is being waged in China, practically all the mission forces being united in this effort to take advantage of the open door and open heart in China to the message of the gospel. The West Africa Mission reports the largest additions to church membership for the past year of all its long and wondrous history.—Selected.

Strange.

Strange, in the clutch of Hate,
Strange, with a world at War,
That we should love so many
We never loved before!

Home-reft boys in the camps—
Not only your son and mine,
But all who are mates with Courage,
All who wear her Sign.

And the soldiers "Over There,"
From lands we have not known,
Fighting for us in the trenches—
They are one with our own.

Men who are moaning in pain,
Ill, and broken, and blind;
Little children who hunger,
Sorrowing womankind—
Ours is the need to succor
And ours are the wounds to bind.

And, O, the call to the heart
Of the foreign, cross-marked field,
With each unnamed soldier resting
On Honor, as a shield!

Strange, in the clutch of Hate,
Strange, with a world at War,
That we are loving so many
We never loved before!
—Mary Stewart Cutting.

The Will of An Insane Man.

In the pocket of an old, ragged coat belonging to one of the insane patients of the Chicago poorhouse there was found, after the patient's death, a will.

The man had been a lawyer, and the will was written in a firm, clear hand on a few scraps of paper. So unusual was it that it was sent to a lawyer; and he read it before the Chicago Bar Association, and a resolution was passed ordering it probated. And now it is on the records of Cook County, Illinois.

The will reads as follows:

I, Charles Lounsberry, being of sound and disposing mind and memory, do hereby make and publish this my last will and testament, in order, as justly as may be, to distribute my interest in the world among succeeding men.

That part of my interests which is known in law and recognized in the sheep-bound volumes as my property, being inconsiderable and of none account, I make no disposition of in this my will. My right to live, being but a life estate, is not at my disposal, but, these things excepted, all else in the world I now proceed to devise and bequeath.

Item: I give to good fathers and mothers, in trust for their children, all good little words of praise and encouragement, and all quaint pet names and endearments; and I charge said parents to use them justly, but generously, as the needs of their children shall require.

Item: I leave to children inclusively, but only for the term of their childhood, all and every the flowers of the fields and the blossoms of the woods, with the right to play among them freely according to the customs of children, warning them at the same time against thistles and thorns. And I devise to children the banks of the brooks and the golden sands beneath the waters thereof, and the odors of the willows that dip therein, and the white clouds that float high over the giant trees.

And I leave to the children the long, long days to be merry in, in a thousand ways, and the night and the train of the Milky Way to wonder at, but subject, nevertheless, to the rights hereinafter given to lovers.

Item: I devise to boys, jointly, all the useful, idle fields and commons where ball may be played, all pleasant waters where one may swim, all snow-clad hills where one may coast, and all streams and ponds where one may fish, or where, when grim winter comes, one may skate, to hold the same for the period of their boyhood. And all meadows, with the clover blossoms and butterflies thereof; the woods with their appurtenances; the squirrels and the birds and echoes and strange noises, and all distant places which may be visited, together with the adventures there found. And I give to said boys each his own place at the fireside at night, with all pictures that may be seen in the burning wood, to enjoy without let or hindrance or without any incumbrance or care.

Item: To lovers I devise their imaginary world, with whatever they may need, as the stars of the sky, the red roses by the wall, the bloom of the hawthorn, the sweet strains of music, and aught else they may desire to figure to each other the lastingness and beauty of their love.

Item: To young men, jointly, I devise and bequeath all boisterous, inspiring sports of rivalry, and I give to them the disdain of weakness and undaunted confidence in their own strength. Though they are rude, I leave to them the power to make lasting friendships and of possessing companions, and to them exclusively I give all merry songs and grave choruses to sing with lusty voices.

Item: And to those who are no longer children or youths or lovers, I leave memory; and bequeath to them the volumes of the poems of Burns and Shakespeare and of other poets, if there be others, to the end that they may live the old days over again, freely and fully, without tithes or diminution.

Item: To our loved ones with snowy crowns I bequeath the happiness of old age, the love and gratitude of their children, until they fall asleep.—Exchange.

WAR ECONOMY CORNER.

Cake Without Sugar.

An excellent cake, though not quite so sweet as with sugar.

1-4 cup butter, oleomargarine or other fat.

2 cups corn syrup.

2 eggs.

3 cups flour.

1-2 tablespoons baking powder.

1-4 teaspoon salt.

1 cup milk.

Cream the shortening, add the syrup and the egg, and mix well. Add the milk. Sift the baking powder and flour together, add it slowly to the mixture and beat. Bake in a moderate oven as a loaf or layer cake or small drop cakes. One-fourth cup of raisins added to the batter gives more flavor and sweetness.

It is sometimes contended that tricks are necessary in trade; and that politics have no indissoluble connection with morals. Such a contention is the abnegation of all Christian ideals; of all practical belief in a God of superintending righteousness and truth. And every untruth, whether in word or act, is a nail in the coffin of life, eternal life.—Canon Diggle.

A Child's Evening Prayer.

Lord, send me sleep that I may live;
The wrongs I've done this day forgive;
Bless every deed and thought and word
I've rightly done or said or heard;
Bless relatives and friends alway;
Teach all the world to watch and pray;
My thanks for all my blessings take,
And hear my prayer, for Jesus' sake,
Amen. —Bishop Graves.

The Happiness Beads.

"If I could have just one thing I know of, I'd be perfectly happy," Pauline sighed.

"It must be a wonderful thing," remarked Uncle Barry, who sat near.

"Not so wonderful," said Pauline, her face brightening, "but very beautiful."

"Animal, vegetable or mineral?" inquired Uncle Barry.

Pauline considered. "Well, I don't know exactly," she said. "How queer—I don't know!"

Her uncle laughed. "Well, you'd better find out what you're wishing for," he said, "and then do your wishing."

A few days later Pauline broached the subject again. "I know what I want more than anything else in the world, Uncle Barry. It's really animal, but it has some mineral in it, and it grows and acts like a vegetable."

It was quite a while before the family could guess. At last—"Coral!" said Uncle Barry, triumphantly. "Well, I don't wonder you are mixed up. Want coral, eh?"

"A string of coral beads," Pauline corrected. "All even, and smooth, and pink."

"It would make you perfectly happy, eh?" asked Uncle Barry.

Pauline looked somewhat uncomfortable. She wished Uncle Barry wouldn't say "eh," and pin a person down so tightly. However, he was waiting for his answer.

"Ye-es," she said, slowly. Indeed, surely it seemed as though a string of coral beads would make the whole world bright.

On the morning of her tenth birthday Pauline found only one package beside her plate. "We put it all into a single gift," her mother smiled.

Pauline unwrapped the package with trembling fingers. When the papers fell off a square white velvet box was revealed; at the snap of a clasp the top flew up, and there, on a bed of white satin, lay coiled a string of pink coral beads! Pauline's face certainly looked like that of the happiest person in the world.

For a while it seemed that the birthday-beads were going to answer their purpose. Pauline wore them all the time—too much, her mother said, but the little girl could not bear to take them off. They were the admiration of all her friends and schoolmates, and somehow they seemed to go well on every dress she had, and go well with both her hats. Yet Pauline was not always happy. One day she acknowledged this to her uncle. "They are just as beautiful as ever—the beads," she said, "but I'm used to them, you see."

Still, she cried bitterly when, on returning one day from an afternoon in town, she found the string of beads gone. One side of the clasp was caught in her collar, and from it hung an inch of string, but not a bead remained. Evidently the other side of the clasp had broken off and spilled the beads. "And it was the most beautiful thing I ever owned," sobbed poor Pauline.

The next time she went to town with Uncle Barry she found herself scanning every nook and corner for the lost beads. "Though that is foolish, I know well enough," she said to herself, sadly. "I'd recognize them anywhere," she added. "There were one or two little marks that I couldn't mistake."

One day while she and her uncle were driving slowly out of town, they met a little girl of about Pauline's own age, dressed in a short, faded gingham and a sunbonnet. Pauline gave a little start. "She's got on my beads!" Uncle Barry heard her whisper. Without knowing it, he drew the horse down to an even slower walk.

The little stranger, seeing the eyes of both fixed on her, broke into a smile. She had started to turn in at the gate of a cottage by the road, but now she halted, fingering her beads.

Pauline was embarrassed; she could think of nothing at all to say, except the first thing that had popped into her head. "That's a pretty necklace," she remarked, and felt her face turn red.

The little girl looked pleased, but not at all confused. She fumbled with the back of her neck, evidently untying a knot, then handed the string of beads over to Pauline. "Indeed it is," she said, joyfully. "The prettiest thing I ever did see in all my life!"

Uncle Barry watched his niece's face as she bent above the beads. What he saw there made him turn to the other little girl. He half expected to see her smile gone, but it was still there.

"I found them myself," she explained joyfully, "one day a few weeks ago—a little way up the road, yonder. First one, then another, then another. They looked like rose petals lying in the mud—only there ain't any roses along a country road!" She laughed aloud at the memory, and, taking her string of beads back from Pauline's reluctant fingers, tied it around her neck again. She was still, laughing as the buggy drove off.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" Uncle Barry asked. "They're your happiness beads, aren't they, little girl?"

"Yes," Pauline answered, slowly. "They are mine, all right. I know now how I lost them. Don't you remember that we came home by this road and I got out to pick wild flowers that day?"

Uncle Barry remembered. He remembered also that a heavy rain had fallen a few hours afterward, and perhaps buried them for some days. No doubt the little girl had thought that there was no chance of ever finding the owner, for few people traveled this road.

"What are you going to do about it?" he repeated. "She will give them up as soon as she finds out that they are not hers."

Pauline frowned. "I don't know,"

she said. "Let me think for another mile."

At the end of the mile she looked up and laughed. "How could I take them back?" she said. "They truly were her happiness beads, weren't they, Uncle Barry? Why, I couldn't take them away from her!"

On their next drive they met the little girl again. She was still wearing the coral beads, and still smiling.

"I declare, she makes me feel happy all over," Pauline said. "They were real happiness beads after all, weren't they?"

"You're right," agreed Uncle Barry. "They did double duty."

Pauline was silent for a long time. "It sounds like a funny thing to say," she remarked, presently, "but I'm glad I lost them."

"I understand," said Uncle Barry; and he did. Do you?

When Billy Was Tardy.

This is the story of the way a nail in the fence of Billy Allen's garden kept the fourth grade room in the Lincoln School from winning the beautiful flag that the teacher and pupils had set their hearts on. It really was not the fault of the nail, as you shall see, for the nail had its own work to do and would rather have been doing it than making trouble for the fourth grade room.

The story of that nail goes back to last summer, when Billy was helping his father fasten some boards that had worked loose in the garden fence. "I can drive nails, father; let me hammer some of them," he suggested.

His father handed him the hammer, and Billy did very well, indeed—for a time. But after he had driven three or four nails he suddenly tired of his task and dropped the hammer to chase a butterfly that was hovering near. It did not seem important to Billy that he had left one nail driven only halfway in, and his father did not notice the half-driven nail when he picked up the hammer and went on with the work.

That was last summer, as I said before. Since school began there have been weekly contests between the rooms of the Lincoln School, which Billy attends, for a beautiful silk American flag. The room that does not have a single tardy mark for the week holds the flag for the following week. Some weeks no room earns the flag, and then it remains locked up in a closet. Billy's room, the fourth grade room, has not yet had the flag once; but there was one week when it looked as if that room were surely going to win. When Friday came, it was the only room in the big building that had no tardy marks.

Billy lives very near the schoolhouse, and he had not been late all the term. It was no fault of his that the room had not won the flag long before. Of course he would not be the one to fail it now.

But on Friday morning he slept a little later than usual. When he dressed, the buttons would not stay buttoned and there seemed to be more of them than usual. Then he wanted an extra slice of toast and had to wait while his mother prepared it. By the time he was ready to start it lacked only four minutes of 9.

"Lots of time," he cried, when he kissed his mother and put on his cap. "I'll go through the garden; it's a short cut."

Billy ran down the garden walk and climbed to the top of the fence. The school yard lay just beyond. The pupils were watching, and they clapped their hands when they saw Billy coming. But Billy did not jump off the fence. He sat there and acted as if he were trying to take something out of the pocket of his trousers.

His mother ran to the door. "Billy, do hurry," she urged. "It's already 9."

The teacher in the fourth grade room came to the window and called sharply: "William Allen, do not sit on that fence an instant longer. The last bell will ring in a minute, and you will be tardy."

Still Billy sat on the fence, although it was plain now that he was trying to climb down. His mother saw that something was wrong and ran down the garden path. Billy began to struggle harder. There was a sound of tearing, and Billy fell to the ground with a big hole in his trousers. Just then the bell rang. Billy's room had lost the flag.

"It was an old nail," complained Billy, crying bitterly, as he climbed backed over the fence and walked to the house to have his trousers mended before he went to school. "It had no business there, anyway."

But later, when he and his father talked it over, he remembered about the nail that he had left half driven; and the lesson that Billy learned is one that he is not likely to forget.—Youth's Companion.

The Littlest One.

My dady 'he's a Captain,

My brother is a Scout,

My suster is a Camp Fire Girl—

But I am just left out.

They each have uniforms to wear

And different things to do.

Oh, dear! I do so wish that I

Belonged to something, too!

My mother tells me not to mind;

She says, "Why, don't you see?

Because you are the littlest one

You just belong to me!"

—Edith Ballinger Price, in St. Nicholas.

Keeping Sport Out of Mischief.

"We're going to have a splendid fire," said Jack with enthusiasm.

"The pile will be 'most as high as the house," cried Jim.

"Oh, won't it be fun?" echoed Mary.

The children were alone that afternoon. And they were as busy as little beavers, raking up the yard. It was a good deal of work, but they didn't mind for they would have such fun afterward watching the bonfire. Besides, mother had promised them marshmallows to toast!

So Jack and Mary and Jim worked away diligently. Only Sport would not work!

Now Sport was always with the children. Every morning he trotted along the country road with them on their way to school. Sometimes he carried a lunch basket or a mitten, for it made him very proud to help. And every afternoon he was waiting to see them safely home. You would have thought that Jack and Mary and Jim couldn't be trusted to go alone. At any rate, Sport was convinced that without him they would surely be lost.

But when it came to raking leaves, Sport wasn't a bit of help. He would crouch beside the pile and bark. Then he would make a plunge and send the leaves flying in every direction. How he chased them! But they whirled so gaily in the breeze that no wonder he took them for butterflies!

At first the children thought this amusing. They were so fond of Sport that whatever he did made them happy. But after their pile had been scattered several times, it didn't seem such fun.

"Stop it, Sport; get away," said Jack.

But it wasn't any use to drive Sport away. He took that for part of the game. And as soon as the children had returned to their raking, back he came more like a whirlwind than ever.

"We've got to tie him up," said Jack.

"You won't hurt him?" cried Mary. "Course not," said Jack. "Where's some rope?"

"We can take the rope off the sled," Jim suggested.

Sport was delighted when they brought out the sled. There wasn't any snow, but he was quite willing to drag his friends about over the leaves, if they wished. He caught the rope in his teeth, ready to pull. But why were they putting the rope around his neck? Sport's delight changed to perplexity. And when they tied him to a tree and left him, he expressed his hurt feelings in howls.

With no Sport to hinder the work went on rapidly. The wind was rising, and an occasional gust caught the leaves. In spite of this the raking was soon finished and the pile ready to light. Jack struck a match and started the blaze. Fanned by the wind, the whole pile broke into flame.

And then Jack discovered that the bonfire was too close to the house. The wind was carrying the flames in that direction!

Jack began beating at the bonfire with his rake.

"Get some water," he shouted to Jim.

Jim rushed away. But in his confusion he couldn't find a pail. The flames were spreading. Mary caught up another rake to help Jack. Their efforts served only to make the fire burn more fiercely. The wind lifted bunches of the burning leaves and hurled them across the yard.

"Hold them down with your rake, Mary," Jack cried.

He ran to the woodpile and began dragging boards to keep the bonfire from blowing away. Jim had found the pails and was pumping furiously. Mary was doing her best to hold the pile against the wind, when an extra gust tugged at the mass beneath her rake. And half the pile rose into the air to fall blazing upon the porch!

A scream from Mary, an answering bark, a flash of tawny fur—and Sport had hurled himself upon the porch and was stamping and scattering the burning leaves. He had gnawed through the rope and freed himself just in time.

In a few moments the fire was checked, and the children hung over Sport, petting and praising him and binding up his scorched paws.

"If he hadn't got loose," said Jack soberly, "the house might have burned down."

"We won't ever tie him up, again," declared Jim.

"And we thought," laughed Mary, with her arms about the shaggy neck, "that we were keeping Sport out of mischief. But he kept us out of mischief instead!"—Abigail Burton in S. S. Times.

Nuthatches Near Home.

One April some years ago a pair of nuthatches (sometimes called "sap-suckers") built a nest in a hollow butternut not many feet from the western windows of our farm home. From the shy habits of these birds I should fancy such a choice of location very unusual, but the place was quiet, the family small and there was no doorway on that side.

Of what material the nest was built

we had no means of knowing, but I believe small chips of bark formed some part of its construction, as we occasionally saw them carried in. The work was begun about the 13th of the month, and they continued to use the nest during most of the summer, though I think but one family of young birds were raised.

Through the whole period of their residence we observed one curious habit of the parent birds, that of wiping with their bills the bark for several inches around the nesting hole. They did not merely dab at it as hens sometimes do at a solid surface to free their beaks from some sticky or cumbersome substance, but maintained a steady whack, whack, for many minutes, with a quick turn of the head between each stroke, until the tree was fairly polished where the process had gone on. Whether their purpose was sanitary or otherwise we never determined, but their labors should have produced a good effect in that direction, as it left little chance for germs or vermin to find lodgment near the nest.

The most interesting sights occurred when the young red squirrels from the next tree grew old enough to become inquisitive and the nuthatch parents displayed their protective tactics. That the third-grown squirrels had positively harmful designs appeared unlikely, but the nuthatches evidently distrusted the whole tribe, whether young or old.

The moment one in his journeyings reached the tree trunk one or both of the "quarks," as we often called them from their peculiar little cry so frequently repeated, flattened out against the bark of the tree, wings extended, head drooping in the most painfully helpless attitude.

Round and round the birds would whirl as if pinned to the tree in their simulation of agony or swooning until the youthful rodents became distracted from any intention of investigating the nestlings, although they sometimes prolonged their visits through curiosity or mischievous interest until we were moved to pity and hustled them away.

As there were five very active squirrels without visible occupation except the harassing of the nuthatches, the duties of guardianship provided ample employment for the anxious parents and ourselves until time relieved the trials of both and, with fiedgelings flown, the birds resumed their unhurried searching of every tree stem, while we relaxed our vigilance with a little more knowledge of wild life.—Our Dumb Animals.

The Funny Pane.

It's in my mother's window, but I think she doesn't know.

Perhaps her eyes are up so high

That she can't see things so.

But when I pull my little chair

Where I can watch things pass,

I have the very best of fun

Just looking through the glass.

The milkman's horse seems up on stilts,

With legs so long and thin;

And, my! the wagon wheels look big.

As round and round they spin.

The people all grow tall like giants,

But in the other pane

They don't look funny any more;

They're common size again.

Sometimes when I laugh right out loud

My mother comes by me,

And squints her eyes to look, and says,

"Why, dear, what do you see?"

Maybe some day I'll tell her,

But I don't want to explain.

I like pretending no one knows

About my 'Funny-Pane.'

—Louise McKinney.

A Four-Footed Farm Hand.

Warren Rice, of Solon, Maine, has a shepherd dog that he considers worth a dollar and a half a day to him, or the price he would have to pay a hired man, says the Kennebec Journal.

"Teddy," the dog, does much of the work that a hired man would do. When Mr. Rice goes off to work into the back field, a mile distant, Teddy goes with him. If Mr. Rice is cutting wood, when a tree is down and his master is cutting the limbs from it, Teddy grabs hold of each one and as it is cut off pulls it away and runs back to get another limb.

When noon time comes his master will say, "Teddy, we had better have dinner," and Teddy goes to the house, where his mistress has put up the dinner in a pail, and takes it back to the woods. He and his master eat dinner together. Mr. Rice lives back a little way from the main road, and when the mail comes, Teddy runs to get the paper and brings it home.—Selected.

Do You Believe in Signs?

A carelessly written, misspelled letter is a sign that you will not get the job you are applying for.

A caved-in chest and bowed shoulders are a sign that you will have a dangerous illness. It may not come for a few years, but it's coming.

If you give up without trying again after a failure, it is a sign that you will always occupy a lower rung on the ladder that leads to the world's treasure-house.

If you find yourself cheating in a game or work or lesson, it is a sign that promotions will be few and far between for you.

If you lose your temper before breakfast, it is a sign that you will have an unpleasant day.

To smile and speak softly when you are angry is a sign that you will be a leader of men.

If you ask three favors of a friend before offering even one, it is a sign that you are going to lose your friend.

To borrow money to spend on pleasure or indulgence is a sign that your mind is weak.

If you can make three people smile before breakfast on a rainy morning, it is a sign that great good fortune is awaiting you.

If your money doesn't last from one pay-day to another, it is a sign that you will be poor all your life.

To betray a confidence given you is a sign that shame is coming to you.

If you wear a scowl or gloomy look four days out of each seven, it is a sign that you will have few friends.

To do a favor for a stranger or some one who cannot repay you is a sign that you will be happy for the next twenty-four hours.

To tell one lie is a sign you will suffer from an uneasy conscience; to tell two is a sign of a bad memory; to tell three is a sign that disgrace is on its way to you.

To own up to your fault and take the blame for any trouble it may have caused is a sign that you will not repeat that offense.

It is a sure sign of good luck if you keep at a difficult problem or task until you have mastered it.

To be suspicious of people's motives or good intentions is a sign that you will be frequently cheated.

It is a sign of long life to be able to control your appetite.

To rejoice in another's good fortune is a sign that you will have many friends.

To show respect to your elders is a sign that you will be a social success.

To think twice each time before you speak is a sign that you will be advanced to a position of trust.

To be magnanimous to an enemy when you have a chance to even up old scores is a sign that you will be a great man.

These three things are signs of good luck that will follow through life: to tell the truth when it is difficult, to keep cheerful amid discouragement, to keep clean in evil surroundings.—Zella M. Walters, in C. E. World.

every speaker. This alone is a great argument for the movement, and if what is expressed by word of mouth, or in letters, forms any criterion, then a number of these men have been brought to a deeper realization of Christian truth. The season of 1918 consisted of eighteen successive Sunday afternoons, June to September, and there has always been each Sunday two short addresses; first class instrumental music and hymn singing by the crowd, under the guidance of an able director. The hymns sung are on large frames, and held in the center of the street, which is closed by the mayor's order for one hour. A conservative estimate registers that considerably over three thousand men have been present during the recent summer. Five thousand cards, containing the Lord's Prayer and a Gospel truth, briefly expressed, have been distributed by a corps of voluntary Christian workers. The co-operation of the Episcopal Clergy has indeed been remarkable. Twenty-two of them have served in the capacity of speakers, a number speaking more than once. The Laity have been well represented, in addresses given by two laymen. The expense of the movement, has throughout the six years, been freely met by thirty-five contributors. It is the hope of many of the Clergy that an evolution will follow from this work, 'now so well established in Pittsburgh, in the forming of a City Mission Center. These street services are under the leadership of a committee of eight—four clergymen and four laymen, appointed annually by the Bishop of the Diocese.

The Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, the Rev. Dr. Wyatt Brown, rector, has received a bequest of $1,000 left by the will of Mr. Samuel Stanhope Pinkerton, a vestryman of the parish.

The Rev. Alfric J. R. Goldsmith, of St. Thomas Church, Barnesboro, has resigned care of that mission, and accepted a call to be the first resident rector of All Saints' Church, Woodlawn. He will enter upon his incumbency on the Feast of All Saints.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. James B. Funston, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop has issued a Pastoral Letter to his Clergy and people on the occasion of the twentieth anniversary of his consecration, from which the following is an extract:

"This great world war has introduced a new element of perplexity in providing for the work both in regard to clergymen and in regard to their support. Many of our clergymen have been called to war service and all available men are being used to fill their places. In addition, the high cost of living makes the former salary far less than what is required for a decent support. Our ministers must be provided for or the churches must be permanently closed. The solution I purpose is to join several places together under one minister, and thus make up a reasonable salary. It is absolutely out of the question in these times to have a clergyman giving his entire time to a place unable to give a third of what is needed to carry on the work. If our people really love the Church they will gladly not only give their share to God's Church to help to spread the gospel, but also as far as possible, be themselves earnest personal missionaries in telling of the great things the Lord has done them in redeeming them from sin and eternal death. While I deeply sympathize with all war work, such as Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A. and St. Andrew's Brotherhood, I would have you realize that the Church is the mightiest influence in this nation for righteousness. President Wilson, General Pershing and every leading public man of any standing nationally will tell us that to close the churches, stop preaching the gospel, would be a national calamity and would ultimately weaken if not destroy the morale of our army at the front. It is most unwise and unpatriotic for any one to say, "I will abandon my Church and will give no means or time to its support. All I have is going to war activities." The government has found the Church one of its strong war supports. It wants you to be just, that is, to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's. We have got to prepare for peace. We are going to win this war and we will win it for righteousness. Now, let us not forget that the Church is the great preacher of righteousness. We need the active, open, Christ-declaring Church more than ever. We cannot afford to shut it up. We do not want any silent churches anywhere, especially in our State of Idaho. We pray that this nation may in all the future build its political as well as individual life in accordance with the teachings of Jesus of Galilee. Consider it a patriotic duty to attend your church services regularly."

Personal Notes

The Rev. Guy H. Frazier, of Red Hook, N. Y., has entered upon his duties as rector of the Church of Our Saviour, Rock Hill, S. C.

The Rev. Frederick W. Goodman, of the Diocese of Rhode Island, but who has been serving at Hastings in the New York Diocese, began on October 1 as rector of St. Mary's Church, Manhattanville, in succession to the Rev.

Dr. Francis A. Brown, who went to California some time since.

The address of the Rev. Dr. W. M. Pettis is White's Cottage, Rockledge, Fla.

The Rev. Charles B. Sparks, rector of St. John's Church, Medina, Diocese of Western New York, since 1911, has resigned his charge, to take effect December 31.

The address of Bishop Demby will be until further notice Hoffman-St. Mary's Industrial Institute, Keeling, Tenn.

Ordinations.

In the Church of the Ascension, Springfield, South Dakota, on October 4, 1918, the Rt. Rev. Hugh L. Burleson, D. D., advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Charles Ernest Coles. Dean Woodruff and the Rev. Messrs. E. F. Siegfried and William Holmes joined in the imposition of hands.

In Christ Church, St. Paul, Minn., on Tuesday, October 1, the Bishop of Minnesota ordained to the diaconate Robert James Ramsey, Ph. D., who was presented by the Rev. W. S. Howard. The Bishop preached the sermon.

It demoralizes life and religion to believe that God does not desire the happiness of His creatures, just as surely as it demoralizes life and religion to imagine that He has no higher aim for them than that they should be happy.—Hugh Black.

YOU WILL WRITE A LETTER LIKE THIS

I wish that I knew which one of the thousands of letters I receive would have the most weight with you, my friend. I can't quote all of them here, but I am going to ask you to read these carefully and then give me a chance to renew your health and make you write me one very much like them:

701 Barnard Street,
Savannah, Ga., Dec. 23, 1918.
Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C. Dear Sir: As you are aware, in 1909 I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and, of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered ten gallons of your Mineral Water, which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months gained twenty-nine pounds, was strong and perfectly well and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

Leeds, S. C., March 2, 1911.
I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of rheumatism, chronic indigestion, kidney and bladder troubles, and in nervous and sick headaches, and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the liver, kidneys and bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter.

C. A. CROSBY, M. D.

These are not selected cases nor are the results unusual. I receive thousands like them from physicians, ministers, lawyers, merchants, farmers, manufacturers and every conceivable profession. I want the satisfaction of receiving such a letter from you. No matter what your complaint may be, dyspepsia, indigestion, nervous headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney or liver disease, or any chronic ailment that has not responded to drugs. I invite you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocket-book. If the water fails to benefit you simply say so, return the empty demijohns and I will promptly and willing refund your money—every cent. Sign below:

Shivar Spring,
Box 64 C, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Water. I agree to give it a fair trial, in accordance with instructions contained in booklet you will send, and if it fails to benefit my case you agree to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return promptly.

NOTE:—"I have had the pleasure of serving the little church at Shivar Spring as Pastor for years, and am therefore well acquainted with Mr. Shivar and his associates, whom I gladly commend as honorable business men and worthy of the confidence of the public. I have personally derived great benefit from the use of the Shivar Mineral Water and have knowledge of its beneficial effects in a great number and variety of cases."—Rev. A. McCa. Pittman.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Every temptation resisted is a trouble escaped.—Ex.

God shows results, He does not always reveal processes.

To trust in man makes us like man. To trust in God makes us like Christ.—Ex.

"If we would escape feeling lonely, we must learn to be alone—alone with God."

If you cannot do the work you like to do, pray that you may like the work you have to do.—Ex.

"The brave confession of a fault is the best of all safeguards against the repetition of the fault."

Let men be convinced that there is such a thing as Christian love, and they will be convinced of sin.—Ex.

It does not matter what creed we merely say: God only hears the creed we live. We only believe what we would live and die for.—E. Garreth.

Nothing is impossible; there are ways which lead to everything; and if we had sufficient will we should always have sufficient means.—Rochefoucauld.

We see the struggle, we hear the sigh
Of this sorrowful world of ours;
But in loving patience God sits on high
Because He can see its flowers.
—Anon.

Spirit Divine, brood down and fill
Us with Thy calm and make us still;
All sighing cares to cease.
Our restless longings cannot hold
The face of Heaven unless it fold
Us round and whisper "Peace."
—Gerald Massey.

In the sympathies of Christian hearts and in reunions of long-parted friends, we have had foreshadowings of the reserves of joy in the eternal home, when we shall have back again the touch of the vanished hand and hear once more the sound of the voice that is still.—

A. Macleod.

The Sun is the eye of Day,
Yet its light conceals
The Life of a thousand suns
Which Night reveals.
And Love is the sun of Life,
Yet its light conceals
The vision of ampler Love
Which Death reveals.

—C. W. Stubbs.

Men who are of faith, and are blessed with faithful Abraham, have within themselves springs of action and sources of comfort. They are never less alone than when all alone. They know the Lord. They do not need to wander to and fro seeking rest. They have found peace; their feet are on the rock; and their faith and hope rest in the living God.—H. L. Hastings.

The Scripture commands us to be "patient toward all men," and this implies patience toward ourselves. A reason for this universal patience is found in the facts of human infirmity and frailty. The God of all patience knoweth our frame and "remembereth that we are dust." Now all this is just as true of ourselves as it is of our neighbors; and hence we need to exercise the same patience on our own behalf as would be required to be exercised toward them.—The Christian.

Every time any man humbly takes God's forgiveness, that man becomes a new witness to men of how strong and good the Saviour is. And look, how they need Him! Not for yourself now, but for them, for Him, take His forgiveness and give up yourself inwardly and outwardly to Him. So used one grows to find men respond to the noblest motives who are deaf to a motive which is less noble. Be a new man in Christ for these men's sake.—
Phillips Brooks.

What looks to this dim eye a stain,
In God's pure light, may only be
A scar brought from some well-fought field,
Where thou would'st only faint and yield.

As a Man Thinketh.

Every day we are becoming more like our thoughts. If they are mean and selfish, we cannot prevent ourselves from becoming so. If they are unclean and evil, our character and conduct will inevitably be shaped by them. It is true that "as a man thinketh in his heart so is he." As Charles Kingsley says: "Think about yourself; about what you want, what you like, what respect people ought to pay you, and then to you nothing will be pure. You will spoil everything you touch; you make sin and misery for yourself out of everything which God sends you; you will be as wretched as you choose; on earth or in heaven, either." And, on the other hand, loving thoughts will produce loving acts; and a generous, kindly way of regarding others in our own minds will bring us to a generous, kindly treatment of them in daily life.

He is a Very Help.

God does not help His children now and then, but now, always now. There is no "then," it exists only in imagination. The only time we ever actually need God is now. If "then" troubles us in imagination and we wonder what will become of us then, let us learn to live with God now. Form the habit of using God and being used by God, and the imaginary and dreadful "then" will be swallowed up in the stream of now when the time comes. No clocks keep time to-morrow. Springs push and hands point now. Now is the appointed time for clocks as well as people. God never helped any one to-morrow. He is a very present help. What is eternity but God's now? Let us then live the eternal God now.—M. D. Babcock.

"Though for a Season in Heaviness."

Too often we shut ourselves up with our sorrow. And yet the darkest day that ever came had some alleviation: the saddest hour that ever struck had something in it to make life possible; but too often we wrap the mantle of grief around our person, and, although the child's hand reaches out its flowers, although the sky sends down a glint of smiling sunshine, although there are wafts to us of some beautiful burst of music which should lift us up on its wing, we shut ourselves up in our sorrow, and say: "No, we are too down and dull to-day to be able to entertain and accept joy." How often the good love of God, therefore, though all around our path, is sent away abashed, disappointed and thwarted. Thus all our life is needlessly shadowed by constant prohibition.—Rev. F. B. Meyer.

Almighty God, Who art the only source of health and healing, the spirit of calm and the central peace of the universe; grant to us, Thy children, such a consciousness of Thy indwelling presence as may give us utter confidence in Thee. In all pain and weariness and anxiety may we throw ourselves upon Thy besetting care, that knowing ourselves fenced about by Thy loving omnipotence, we may permit Thee to give us health and strength and peace; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

"FOR THE SINS OF THE WHOLE WORLD."

Maria W. W. Proctor.

The sorry tale of sin since time began,
Which drowned the world and burned
Gomorrah's plain;
Idols and orgies of primeval man;
Multitudes killed for power or private gain
By ancient rulers in times long gone by;
Hatred and greed and worldliness and ease,
Forgetfulness of creed or motives high;
Our minds have taken full account of these.

These we have thought were by our Saviour borne
Upon the Cross, where He our ransom paid;
These were the sins that made our Saviour mourn;
These the sore burden on His spirit laid;
We never thought new wickedness could be
More than this bad world ever knew before.
We never dreamed another flood to see,
Of villainy and cruelty and gore.
Nor dreamed of crowds inhuman yet to be,
For whom He did to God for pardon sue,
This Man had no foreknowledge to foresee.
But the Lord knew.

Few Big Inventions Made by Germans.

During the last few months I have heard the Germans arraigned as blatant, boorish, barbaric, yet in nearly every case the speakers suffixed to their invectives such an expression as "But when it comes to brains you will have to hand it to them; they have made science."

What, hand it to them? What epoch-making invention or discovery is of German origin—except a stamp on which is inscribed "Made in Germany"? Their scientists have kicked up a fair amount of spray as they gamboled in their pool, but the world has yet to hear a mighty Teutonic splash. Time and again French, English, American, Spanish and Italian inventors and discoverers have sent tidal waves around the globe. Let us now be specific.

The steam engine has been called the greatest of all inventions; it broke the shackles from slaves; it mingled the marts of the world; it makes neighbors of the antipodes. Newcomen, a native of Devonshire, obtained the patent for the first partially successful steam engine; Watt, a Scotchman, perfected it; Cuynot, Murdock and Trevithick brought forward the locomotive, not on German soil; Stephenson, an Englishman, was the first to apply the locomotive steam engine to railways for passenger traffic; France, England and America applied it to navigation. When all had been completed Germany pulled the whistle cord, shouted "Hoch der Kaiser!" and tagged it "Made in Germany."

The telegraph, which brings us the daily history of the world, was invented by an American. Professor Morse, who also suggested the Atlantic cable, which was subsequently laid by the American merchant-scientist, Cyrus Field, assisted in "mooring the New World alongside of the Old" by Lord Kelvin, the prince of physicists, a British subject. Graham Bell, the chief inventor of the telephone, was born in Scotland and grew to fame in America. A young Italian, Marconi, gave the wireless telegraphy to the world. The house of Hohenzollern has made great use of these inventions in telling Great Britain, America and Italy in arrogant verbiage what the Vaterland has done for the benighted peoples of the earth.

Cyrus McCormick, a native of West Virginia, produced the reaping machine which harvests the food of the world; Meikle, of England, brought forth the thrashing machine; thus was the famine banished. Eli Whitney, of Massachusetts parentage, invented the cotton gin; Hargraves, an Englishman, made the spinning-jenny; Arkwright, also English, supplied its efficiency with his famous spinning-frame; the Englishman Kay introduced the fly shuttle in weaving; Brunel, who devised the knitting machine, and Cartwright, inventor of the power loom, were British citizens. Thus was the world clothed.

Although Germany is militaristic and worships at the shrine of Mars, what motive offering has she made to the god of war? It was not she who contributed gun-cotton, gun powder, smokeless powder, percussion cap, nitro-glycerine, dynamite, torpedo, shrapnel, automatic cannon, magazine rifle, breech-loading gun, gatling gun, revolver, Maxim silencer, hammerless gun, gunboat, ironclad battery or ship, armor plate, revolving turret, submarine, or airplanes.

Since Germany borrowed her military appliances from other nations we are not surprised that she obtained her devices of prosperity from the same source. She did not produce the first aniline dye vulcanized rubber, liquid gases, gas engine, water-gas, thermometer, barometer, pianoforte, barbed wire, cut nails, plate glass, circular saw, cable car, electric car, sleeping car, airbrake, bicycle, automobile, pneumatic tire, sewing machine, typewriter, calculating machine, cash register, steel writing pen, etc., ad infinitum.

The greatest thing Germany has done is to falsely advertise herself as the light of the world. No son of hers invented the electric light, the gas light, the acetylene light, the kerosene light, the searchlight, the flashlight, the safety lamp, the candle dip, or the friction match. America, France, England and other "untutored" nations performed these tasks. The sun, moon and stars are the only lights left for Germany's contention, and, according to the Mosaic account, the Lord and not the Kaiser made and placed them in the firmament.

Daguerre, a Frenchman, presented us with photography. Our own Edison brought forth the motion picture to delight and instruct the eye, and the phonograph to please and teach the ear. The Germans enjoy our reels and records, and, lifting high their steins, drink a prolonged toast to the achievements of the Vaterland, "Deutschland uber Alles."

Galileo, who first saw the heavens with a telescope, was an Italian. The men who first saw the earth and its teeming life with a microscope were not of German origin. Yet many telescopes and microscopes in our colleges, being marked "Made in Germany," have led students to believe that these wonderful instruments were devised by German brain. The Germans are mechanics, not inventors.

By use of the compound microscope Pasteur, the French biologist, as early as 1857, demonstrated a connection between microscopic organisms and disease. This was nine years before Dr. Koch, the German bacteriologist, had graduated. In this connection the important antiseptic surgery of Dr. Lister, of England, should be recorded. Edward Jenner, the discoverer of vaccination, and Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood, were Englishmen. An American taught the world the use of anaesthetics. Our dentists excel all others. They are employed by many crowned heads—even the Kaiser has his.

The Teutons have not shown the engineering skill of the French, who cut the Suez Canal, or of the Americans, who joined the Atlantic and the Pacific at Panama. The decimal or metric system by which the Germans make their measurements is a gift from France. The method by which they make their steel is that of Sir Henry Bessemer, of England. Many of the fruits and vegetables, of which they eat an enormous quantity, were brought forth by our own peerless Burbank. No wonder that the Germans can "goose-step" so high, for what else have they practiced?

Lavoisier, the father of modern chemistry, was a Frenchman; Linnaeus, the founder of botany, was of Swedish origin. To Hutton, of England, we are indebted for geology; to Maury, of Virginia, for the physiography of the sea; to Descartes, of French parentage, for analytical geometry; to Comte, of France, for sociology; to Germany for sauerkraut and pretzels. Germany has not contributed her quota toward the world's advancement. How she struts in her foreign plumage. She is neither inventive, resourceful nor original.

She has made no geographical discoveries of importance. Her neighbors have. What role did she play in discovering various portions of the New World? Did she establish any colonies? I thank God she did not. Her sons did not compose the crew of Magellan's fleet, the first to circumnavigate the globe. A German did not discover the north pole, nor lead the way toward the south pole. It is high time to cease talking of Germany's achievements unless one wishes to indulge in satire.

History and study will reveal that the world's greatest teacher, scientist, inventor, discoverer, statesman, general, philosopher, preacher, painter, poet, architect novelist or singer was not "Made in Germany."—From "The Montgomery Advertiser."

The sphere of hope is "things not seen." Therefore a Christian's real possession is not what he sees. A thousand worlds with all the joy which they could yield are as nothing compared with our appointed inheritance—J. Hastings.

THE VISITATION OF SICKNESS AND MORTALITY.

To the other burdens of body and spirit which our people are bravely bearing has been added the scourge of influenza, which is now prevalent throughout the country. In the midst of our warfare against a distinct enemy with whom we could cope on somewhat equal terms, and at a time when the promise of victory was making us too confident, perhaps, in our prowess and invincibility, came this unseen foe before which armaments are powerless and soldiery helpless. Its hosts innumerable and invisible have invaded our homes, attacked our persons and besieged the very passages of physical life. Its approach to our shores was foretold, but made little impression, and like so many of God's judgments of old times its coming was "at an instant, suddenly." In a few days the whole country stood aghast at its onslaught. We were early warned that our best defense lay in quick surrender to an attack and an almost passive submission until its ravages were overpast. Even so it exacts a heavy tribute from its victims in suffering and humiliating weakness and physical depression, and to a number startling in its proportions it brings the summons of death in the midst of their days, with the entail of bereavement and sorrow which the last enemy ever imposes upon human love and fellowship.

"Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it?" is the challenge of Amos to the men of his day, and it comes down to us at such a time as this with all its primitive significance. The Herdsman of Tekoah was no narrow-minded religionist of but one idea, but a singularly acute observer and thoughtful reasoner. He is addressing men who thought in terms of the material and the obvious; who had put away the notion of God's overruling judgments, and trusted in the arm of flesh and the seeming permanence of ordinary conditions. He considered with intelligence the secondary causes in which they confided and which in a measure they assumed to control, and knew their value and stability. But God he knew personally as the supreme intelligence and all-controlling will, the sovereign and righteous First Cause, imminent in all things, commanding and disposing all events. His allegiance and his trust could find no fixed foundation short of Him.

It is easy for us to become bewildered among the sophistries of our day or to be entangled in our own logic when we seek to apprehend in detail the workings of God's providence. "His judgments are a great deep" which we cannot fathom, knowing but in part. We hold a few threads in the intricate web of life and must weave them in as wisely and strongly as we may. Other threads are held in other hands, some too remote for us to know. Then there are the laws of nature, and the rebellious powers of sin and evil lodged in human and satanic personalities. But God holds all the threads and knows the whole pattern of His perfect will. The questionings that arise within our little minds are so involved, the problems are so intricate, that we are tempted at a time to modify our old faiths or invent new theories to help God, as it were, out of His difficulties. Let us be sure that with Him there are no difficulties; that His love cannot be overcome of evil or His power be tied up in the forces of His own creation. Let us trust God as He calmly trusts Himself. "If it be marvelous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in those days, should it also be marvelous in mine eyes? saith the Lord of Hosts." No science can supersede, no philosophy supplant, the wisdom of a sincere belief in the perfect counsels of Him "whose never-failing providence ordereth all things in heaven and earth." It is to be acknowledged first of all, and then to be accepted and trusted with the simplicity of little children.

This evil disease came not causeless to the country at large or to any individual. For the country its message should not be hard to read. It makes us think that perchance God has greater things for us to be and to do than we have yet realized, if only we are sufficiently humbled, sufficiently subdued to His hand. A great confidence in a righteous cause, a wonderful outburst of patriotic fervor and sacrifice and a speedy success on the field of battle might not accomplish this—might, indeed, make us proud and self-sufficient and forgetful of God. Who can doubt that in His love for this people whom He has called to so great honor and privilege the God of nations is seeking to lead them to a deeper sense of dependence upon Him and of the insufficiency of human might and physical attainment? Surely He is teaching the world that lesson today in divers manners! "To humble thee and to prove thee!"—not only Egypt, but Israel of old; not only Russia and Germany, but the choicest of God's elect peoples today have need of discipline that they may learn wisdom, of chastening that it may yield in them peaceable fruits of righteousness." May His Spirit impress the lesson upon the consciousness of this whole nation and make it fit for His great purposes!

For those who are afflicted in their own persons or in the loss of friends or loved ones the message is much the same. Many a soul, we doubt not, has been reminded anew of the frailty of life, of the uncertainty of their hold upon the present order. It is a wholesome thing to know this, if so be it makes us neither reckless nor afraid, but invites us, leads, impels us to lay firmer hold upon Him who is the life indeed. Good out of evil can be seen on every side in these days, thank God! There have been not instances alone, but an almost universal outpouring of kindness and personal service on behalf of those in need which means much for the future achievement and development in all that is true and worthy in the character of the whole people. "My people doth not consider" has ever been the complaint of their Heavenly Father. If this visitation makes men think, forces them to face the actualities which surround them, to know themselves and life and death for what they are, it will not have come in vain or failed of its mission from the good hand of God.

For a true penitent there is one supreme blessing, and that is to be received of the Father. There is one supreme joy, and that is the Father's presence. There is one supreme life, and that is the Father's service.

Here and There

President Wilson's answer to Austria will probably put the finishing touches upon the disintegration of that polyglot empire, which has only been holding together by the merest threads for the past six months. No great power in history has a worse record for oppression, except possibly Turkey, than has the dual monarchy, so we need shed no tears over its exit from the world's stage.

At the same time that news comes from Berlin that rubber tires on automobiles are no longer seen, and that they put springs between the rim and iron tires to ease the jolts, we are told by an editorial in the Scientific American that a new composition has been found in this country to take the place of rubber. It is made by mixing rubber with fish scales, which at present go to waste in large quantities around our large fish canneries. We are informed that this preparation has all the elasticity and durability of rubber itself and can be made at very much less cost.

The promulgation of a declaration of independence at Prague makes us wonder where that city is and how long it has been there. It was founded in 722, and is at present the third largest city in Austria-Hungary. In 1620, just outside of its walls, the Elector Frederic of Bohemia was defeated and deprived of his crown in the battle of White Hill, so that the city has not been the capital of a country for two hundred and ninety-eight years, but during all of that time it has fostered national aspirations, and in 1848 was bombarded for two days by the Austrians on account of the democratic tendencies of the Slavic Congress then in session there. The republic of Czech-Slovaks will be welcomed back into the family of nations by all of her sister democracies.

An After-the-War Reconstruction Conference has been called to meet in Washington next January under the auspices of the National Popular Government League, of which Senator Owens is the chairman. The exact date has not yet been fixed, but we may be sure that this will be a most important meeting, and will be given wide publicity.

The reports of increased need, death by starvation, suffering from famine and pestilence has led to a new survey of conditions in the Western War Zone. The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief have been attempting since October, 1915, to provide the means of livelihood for the subject races of the Ottoman Empire, the refugees of the Russian Caucasus, Mesopotamia, Persia and Palestine.

The present situation has been summarized by a committee of which James L. Barton, Ambassador Elkus, Henry Morgenthau, Charles E. Hughes, William Howard Taft, Cleveland H. Dodge, Samuel T. Dutton and W. W. Peet and many other prominent men are members, from the reports of returned missionaries, physicians, teachers, business men and the files of the Department of State. After careful consideration of the report, the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, to be incorporated as the American Committee for Relief in the Near East is making preparations for an organized nation-wide campaign January 12-19 for $30,000,000.00 to meet the im-

NANCY BYRD TURNER

Lord, are they safe in heaven above? The world is rife with war;
The very hills are rivers, and the sea is stained afar.
Lest the sound of the big guns smite them, lest a red wave distant beat
Out to the shore eternal, and touch their ransomed feet;
Lest the scent of the battle reach them, acrid with fury's breath,
O shelter them and shield them, who are done with strife and death!

He said: They can hear, in heaven above, the word that the long winds bring;
It echoes the old, old thunders of a world in travailing;
They look on the blood-stained waters as once a happy host,
Saw the cleft tides returning from Canaan's hard-won coast;
They know that a black pall rises, the smoke that hell hath made—
But I move in the face of the tumult, and they are not afraid.

Christ, have they peace in Paradise? The earth is hot with pain;
There hath broken a piteous clamor from city and field and plain.
Lest they should hear the mothers weep beneath the lonely sky,
Lest any tender angel there should catch the children's cry,
Lest they should mark the strong man's groan, or read the old hearts' fears,
O shield them, shield them mightily, who are done with grief and tears!

He said: As a cloud of witnesses they listening lean, and know
That earth is a fiery furnace, thrice heated in its woe.
They felt the pulse of its anguish the wide, far spaces through—
Shall it fall dumb before they know, who once were mortal, too?
They see the pain and the passion, . . . Yea, but they see beside ME in the furnace with mine own—and they are satisfied.

mediate needs for relief in Western Asia.

Influenza has caused the postponement of the following conventions until safer times: The American Public Health Association, Chicago, from this week until December; the American Prison Association, New York, October 14-18, indefinitely; three of the five sectional conferences of the National Tuberculosis Association as follows: The Southern, Birmingham, October 11-12; the Northern, Pittsburgh, October 17-18; the New England, Providence, October 25-26, indefinitely.

One of the incidental effects of the establishment of the Students' Army Training Corps in the colleges and universities in this country is the somewhat anomalous position thus given to secret societies and fraternities. The War Department has directly requested these organizations to suspend their activities during the war so far as they affect members of the corps. The Department is said to regard fraternity activities and military discipline as incompatible.

Santeri Nuorteva, recently appointed American representative of the Finnish Republic, is one of the leaders of the Finnish-American co-operative movement. There are forty-four Finnish co-operative stores in Wisconsin, Minnesota and Michigan, about half of them transacting their business through a central exchange in Superior, Wis. The forty-four stores together have over 7,000 stockholders, and in 1917 had a turnover of over $1,500,000.

Further evidence that religion is becoming increasingly associated with man's daily work is found in the pulpit utterances of prominent Church leaders. One of them recently said: "Religion to-day does not find its chief expression in the house of worship. Rather is it in the true daily life of man in all the relationships. The mother preparing an economical yet nourishing meal for her family, the farmer working long hours to feed us, the seamen braving dangers to carry food to the famishing of Europe, the soldier fighting for humanity, are religiously engaged. The Y. M. C. A. is doing religious work not only when it holds devotional services, but when it provides for our soldiers' movies, chewing gum, dancing and vaudeville."

A bill has been introduced in Congress with the approval of the War Department providing for higher rank for army chaplains. This plan has the approval of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and provides that one-fortieth or less of the chaplains may be made lieutenant-colonels; one-tenth majors; four-tenths captains and the remainder first lieutenants. Some of the chaplains going into service, if this bill becomes law, may be commissioned in grades higher than first lieutenant from the beginning of their service. Promotion will be through military channels on recommendation of commanding officers because of successful service.

The erection of community houses as fitting memorials to the soldiers of the present war, instead of shafts, such as were erected after the War Between the States, is suggested editorially in the American City for September. "Liberty buildings" is the name proposed for these structures, which, it is suggested, should be designed "to help the living while commemorating the dead." Let the erection of these buildings, says the editorial, be begun "at such time as may best help to tide over in some measure the period of readjustment when our returning soldiers or our industrial workers shall be in need of employment."

President Wilson recently took a step that may have far-reaching effects upon the industrial work of penal and correctional institutions. He set aside an executive order of President Roosevelt, forbidding the War, Navy and other departments to purchase prison made goods, and authorized the placing of war contracts with the heads of prison and reformatories at prevailing prices. He further ruled that prisoners engaged on such contracts should receive wages corresponding to those paid for similar work in the vicinity.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE BOARD OF MISSIONS.

Mr. Editor: Please permit me to express my gratification at seeing in your issue of October 12 a somewhat fuller report than usual of the proceedings of the Board of Missions. Yet this report, except in the brief account of Canon Smart's visit, is a mere skeleton. Perhaps space forbids more than the publication of actual results. One would think, however, that the publication of fuller minutes would be interesting and valuable to the Church people who subscribe to our Church papers. As it is, nothing is generally known of the discussions or of the voting, even though some measure may have passed by only a slight majority. It is true that not often is there any sharp division, as, for example, in the Panama case, nor is there often a very close decision; but at every session some matter is discussed about which, it seems to me, Church readers would be interested in knowing, and ought to know, more than the bare record of the decision.

FOR RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN THE EAST.

Mr. Editor: I am very greatly interested in the relief work in Asia Minor, and as the call for contributions has not brought in anywhere near enough for even maintaining life, any plan that promises to add to the contributions should be given its trial. In emergencies the governments do not attempt to saddle the cost on one year's work, but get out bonds to be paid for during the several years following. This is the greatest crisis in history, and as we cannot get enough money for relief work by appeals made at the present moment, we might get enough by selling bonds and stamps to be redeemed later. Churches could easily do this, and ask the members, as their bonds fall due, to contribute to their payment. As bonds would have first right to treasury money, church improvements would have to be postponed, and this would stimulate the members to give more. Every one has enough trust in churches to take bonds from them at face value. If the churches would do all they can in this matter, they would have achieved something that carries with it irresistible evidence as to the value of organized Christianity.

COMMUNION BY INTINCTION.

Mr. Editor: That misgiving is felt in the minds of many devout Churchmen in regard to the method of administration of Holy Communion is sufficiently attested by correspondence similar to that of Dr. Greene, noted in Church periodicals widely sundered by distance.

In England a few years ago the testimonies of many leading medical men were adduced to show that danger from infection is negligible, and further, be it noted, that the celebrant, if contagion or infection were probable, is in the least enviable position, as the service of ablutions will sufficiently suggest; yet, as a matter of common knowledge, the clergy are among the most healthy of the population.

Wine is aseptic; and the attitude of the devout communicant is that of faith, whether expressed or unexpressed. The regular communicant does without doubt feel that in the Sacrament of Holy Communion a special blessing attends the reception of the holy food, which precludes misgiving, or earthly danger.

What known facts are there to the contrary? In speaking to medical men, communicants of our Church, the writer has never heard of a single case inimical to human health that has arisen from the use of the common chalice. To dwell at large upon this subject is obviously a matter of difficulty, and opens up nothing less than a theological dissertation which is not to be thought of in connection with so momentous a subject. Holy Communion is a means of grace to be reverently used, and not a theme for debate.

Yet the matter may not be shelved entirely. On this continent the proportion of communicants to the confirmed is woefully small, and the reason cannot be adequately set down at the door of indifference. Is it not most likely that questions similar to that outlined by your previous correspondent are largely responsible for the paucity of attendance upon Holy Communion in our churches today, a condition not generally found even among communicants of other bodies, who have adopted a system of administration that pares away all misgiving on the side of hygiene?

Yet the rubrics governing the whole service of Holy Communion clearly define the duty of the priest; and the cup is clearly to be "delivered" into the hands of each communicant. At this point the clergy are face to face with the plain obligation to celebrate and administer Holy Communion as intended by the Church, or to administer that sacrament in a way not authorized by our communion. Individual bishops may perhaps permit a deviation from the plain terms of the Prayer-Book, but even our revered bishops are under an obligation to conform to and obey the "doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America"; thus the matter is not one of permission but of authority.

The matter sooner or later will have to be taken up by the whole Church. A lead must and should be given by the whole bench of bishops in a corporate capacity; and may not be left to the decision of individual congregations, vestries or clergymen who may find themselves out of harmony with the doctrine and polity of this Church.

As regards the administration by intinction, save for the breaking of the rubrics governing Holy Communion, the plain intention of the Church is maintained. By this method the common chalice is preserved, the laity have communion in both kinds, and many painful experiences are done away with. Such a mode of reception, too, takes on a new and enlightening significance, and from many points of view would be of benefit to the Church.

To my mind the difficulty likely to arise as the result of this, to us, new method of administration may be overcome by an authorized alternative use, by which parishes desirous of retaining the ancient method can be permitted to do so, while others, who for the relief of conscience desire the administration of Holy Communion by intinction, may receive it thus with the full approbation of the Church.

For an alternative use by intinction, the words of administration would be altered; but even there no insuperable difficulty exists at the moment when the Paten is offered by way of invitation, the well-known words could be used once for each raitful of communicants; next the chalice could be exhibited with the present words, while a new statement and invitation made up of the two present "words" of administration would meet the needs of the Church.

Such modern-day objections or misgivings as are now to be contended with call for enlightened dealing; these difficulties are not to be dismissed lightly or with a word. The Church may be progressive without in any way being false to her trust or her Master; for was He not progressive, with a degree of progression that drew upon Him the enmity of those who looked upon the old way as the last word in God's revelation? In our own time the Church must strive to lead, she has followed too long in the direction of necessary reform. There is also a need that we lay to heart the words of St. Paul, "The letter killeth, but the Spirit maketh alive."

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER FROM AN OFFICER AT THE FRONT.

So much has happened since I last wrote you a real letter that I hardly know where to begin, there is so much to tell, so many experiences to relate.

It was a great affair. Our battalion led the regiment, and we came off gloriously. Captured thirty-five machine guns, five field pieces and many prisoners, and "G" company had the distinction of getting the first two prisoners, but, oh lady, after we reached our objective we sure had it! Nearly seventy-two hours under heavy artillery fire, out in an open field with no cover whatever, and shells bursting, banging, whistling, I was sure for a while that you were slated to be a widow. There are some things about war which are not very nice to talk about or remember, so I am going to skip over a lot, because truthfully, I'm kinder fed up on it, and would rather write about something else. My nerves are just getting normal again.

Anyhow, I can go on to tell you that we captured kitchens with meals cooking on them, horses, commissaries, two Red Cross nurses operating machine guns, and oh my, how my boys did scran. Just waltzed right into machine guns, never hesitating. They are a great bunch, and have a wonderful spirit. They cannot lose. You have no idea the close bond between the men and officers now. We had the most wonderful artillery barage you could imagine; just simply blew everything off the face of the earth.

We had the right edge of the salient, and are now getting new clothes and re-equipped near Toul. Where we go from here I don't know, but we won't get much rest, for we did so wonderfully well that we are now classed with the marines as one of the stock divisions. The marines fought on our left, and I understand they said, "Give us the sixth and we'll go through hell." We made a name for ourselves and are being called the "Fighting Fools," for we reached in one day an objective which it was figured it would take three days to reach.

The Boche are a peculiar lot. Many of them speak English and I talked with several. The Kaiser has them hypnotized, and I feel sorry for them. The fools operate their guns until you are most on them, and then "Kamerad," and they can't understand why some of our fellows won't play with them, and some of our bunch are right blood-thirsty. They come running up scared white, hollering "Kamerad," and nearly all of them with a picture in his hand showing mother, wife or family and begging mercy, which most of them got.

This war is a rotten game. I hate it and all concerned in it. It will change anybody, I believe. Anyhow, it gives one a different view of life. I would rather talk about the wonderful day when it's all over and I can come back to you and forget all the horrible business. But it will sure make a Christian out of one.

Well, I've been over the top now; seen, heard and felt it all; and I'm ready to be on my return in some honorable way.

Since I've seen and talked to the Boches I don't believe that the war is going to end so quickly as people think. I talked to one prisoner, who had lived in England twelve years. He said that the day before was his birthday, and that it was the happiest day of his life. He also stated that all the German soldiers were just waiting to be taken prisoners: that was their only way out of it; that all the working class were sick of it; but that the monied and political forces wanted to keep on. I said, "Why don't you start a revolt?" He said, "Oh, you don't know the German discipline." Well, no one knows what the future holds. Maybe we'll have peace before we know it.

The Great Commission

The Missionary Treasury—Mr. King's Report.

The progress of the apportionment. To October first there has been received from—

Parishes	$554,333.88
Individuals	144,515.02
Sunday schools	188,227.03
Woman's Auxilliary	82,072.81
Junior Auxilliary	13,290.82

$982,439.56

This is $24,129.53 less than was received last year from the same period. On July first last the decrease was $66,700. On August first it was $34,800, and on September first it was $25,400. It will be seen how great is the improvement. Everyone will rejoice at this. Individual contributions, including gifts to the "One Day's Income Plan," are responsible for this favorable change. On the other hand, parish apportionments are behind $42,500, and gifts from the Woman's Auxiliaries are $8,900 less than last year.

We know that financial statements in the main are hopelessly dull, and that it requires much determination and fortitude to read them. So we want those who reach thus far in this letter to take courage and read on in order to realize how it is that the Board's bill is so very much larger than heretofore. There is mighty little difference between an individual, a corporation, a society. All have their obligations to meet, and in these days especially all feel the pressure of the war, and it is tremendous.

In whole or in part the Board cares for twenty-one hospitals, three colleges, 423 schools, 2,446 mission stations. On its rolls are 2,758 missionary soldiers, of whom 808 are clerical and 1,950 lay. Rates of exchange, passenger rates, freight, insurance, rents, hospital supplies, repairs, fuel and the countless other items that come into the daily life—the cost of all these has vastly increased. Everyone knows this—everyone understands. Probably 75,000 Churchmen are now in military service, and the greater number are unable to fulfil the parochial obligations. Several hundred of the clergy are with the armed forces, and their parishes must do the best they can without them.

Brothers and sisters throughout the Church, but three months remain to complete our apportionments. Most parishes have not yet done so. There is still due the sum of $693,830.44. And this is but the minimum. Every dollar is needed, and more, too.

Men today are seeing the Son of Man in a new light—witness the myriad host now bearing testimony to His Name. Their hearts throb with the promise that His righteousness shall prevail upon earth, and they are spending their blood on the fields of battle in order to vanquish the forces of evil. And men now realize they are their brothers' keepers, and their tenderness is limitless.

May we, too, learn, maybe we have already done so, the lesson of forgetting self, and of substituting therefor; not obligation or duty, but prayer to Father and to country for assignment of service. And God and country show the way. All things we must do for our country in these heavy days, and all things, too, for God and His children. Not a minimum in either case—but all things.

Treasurer.

Extracts From Letter From Miss H. M. Bedell.

St. Andrew's Mission,
Stephen's Village, Alaska,
Summer of 1918.

Our summer's work is so different from that in the winter. The thermometer goes up to 90 degrees, and being near the Arctic circle, the days and nights are light, the sun setting about 11 P. M. and rising soon after midnight. It is hard to go to bed when the sun is shining—in fact, the natives stay up as long as they can endure it, then sleep for fifteen and twenty hours at a time. They say it is easier to work at night, because it is cooler, and the mosquitoes are not so bad then.

The Indians go to their fish camps soon after the Fourth of July, and I had planned to keep school open until that time, but the children were so sleepy that very little work could be done. As it is an old custom among the natives, not only here, but in other villages, to stay up most of the night, we have decided to try the plan of having school at right during the month of June.

After the Fourth the natives go to their fish camps, to get ready for the run of King Salmon. Some have huge fish wheels, which are turned by the current, and catch the fish as they turn around, while others catch them in nets.

The village is then quite deserted, except as they come and go, bringing their dry fish to their caches, or come on Sunday for service.

We have a row-boat, tiny tent and folding cots, and a little Indian girl living with me, and I visit them to care for the sick and to encourage more sanitary camp life.

At Albert's camp we arrived about supper time. We were greeted heartily and soon were eating a bountiful supper of fish, rice, tea and crackers and blue berries. We found Chief Joseph and his family and several others there; so everybody assembled for evening prayer, singing, etc. Chief Joseph said the Indians were pleased to have us visit them.

"Good-nights" were said, and we all went to their tents, but we did not sleep much, for the dogs just back of our tents wanted to do their part in entertaining us, and refused to be quieted. The next morning we visited Albert's potato patch, fish smoking house, etc., and could honestly give him the praise that he deserved.

As we wanted to visit Adam's camp, we were soon on our way up the river and arrived there about 2 o'clock. We stayed a little while, and started on our way again.

As the rowing up the river is hard, William helped us. While we enjoyed the trip, we were glad to get back.

Other trips to Ray River, Doll River and Belle's camp were full of interest, and made with prayer, that I might win the love and confidence of these people.

Berrying fills many of our days. We get blueberries, red raspberries, currants and cranberries. The young women come to the mission to make jam, jelly, etc., for winter.

Our garden is in full bloom, and we feel repaid for all our hard work. We also have potatoes, cabbage, beets, turnips, carrots and cauliflower; but they hardly bloom and mature before the frosts come, and we feel that the winter is near, and with imagination's eye we see the piles of snow and the thermometer showing 60 and 65 degrees below zero, and the dog team sleighs instead of canoes, etc. School will soon begin.

A man got up in a meeting to speak. It was down in Rhode Island, out a bit from Providence. He was a farmer, an old man. He had become a Christian late in life, and this evening was telling about his start. He had been a rough, bad man. He said that when he became a Christian even the cat knew that some change had taken place. That caught my ear. It had a genuine ring. It seemed prophetic of the better day coming for all the lower animal creation. So I listened.—S. D. Gordon

June 26-July 3. At sea.

July 10. New York.

Church War Commission.

A meeting of the Executive Committee of the War Commission was held in the New York offices on October 17. Among items of business passed upon, the following are of general interest:

Hitherto the War Commission has been appropriating $100 to each chaplain recently commissioned in the Army or Navy, and has been offering the privilege of borrowing from the War Commission $500 without interest for a term of eighteen months, with a possible extension of time. This ruling has now been modified so as to read that there will be no financial obligation in the case of the disability or the death of the chaplain. Two thousand three hundred dollars has been loaned to recently commissioned chaplains. Five hundred dollars has been given to chaplains for use among those suffering from the influenza epidemic in the camps.

There was a preliminary discussion of the method and time of the forthcoming appeal for funds with which to finance for the coming year the Commission and the allied societies engaged in war work. Bishop Lawrence appointed a committee to meet on Friday, October 25, to discuss in detail the needs of the various societies engaged in war work of the Church, and to present a definite report in regard to the sum total necessary. A further report on this matter will be given to the Church papers as soon as definite information is obtained in regard to the method and time of the campaign.

The Commission passed upon the appeals of the various parishes in the neighborhood of camps and cantonments, in regard to appropriating sums of money to be devoted to war work, such sums of money to be used in the entertainment of soldiers, and in the salaries of men exclusively engaged in the war work of the respective parishes. It is the opinion of the Commission that the parishes near the camps should be strengthened so that the war work may be as effective as possible.

The Secretary announced the resignations of the following civilian chaplains: The Rev. Dwight F. Cameron from Kelly Field, Texas, to take effect October 1; the Rev. George Long from Camp Dodge, Iowa, to take effect August 10, and the Rev. E. M. Bearden from Camp Sheridan, Ala., to take effect October 11.

The following minute on Church Pensions was passed:

Resolved, That the War Commission direct the Sub-Committee on Pensions to use the appropriation of $25,000 hitherto made for pensions, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the pension assessments to the Church Pension Fund for the period of military service of any clergyman of this Church who, since April 6, 1917, has entered the military service of the United States or of any of its allies, the basis of the pension assessment being the immediately previous salary received in the Church, provided that it was not less than $1,200.

The following is the list of the men from our Church who are in the present class at the Chaplains' Training School at Camp Taylor, Ky: The Rev. D. C. White, the Rev. F. O. Musser, the Rev. John Gravatt, the Rev. Edward G. McAllister, the Rev. Gabriel Ferrell, the Rev. William W. Gillis, the Rev. A. S. Lawrence, the Rev. Christopher Kellar and the Rev. E. A. Penick, Jr.

Council of Missionary Bishops.

A new thing was launched in the Church when the first Council of Missionary Bishops met under the presidency of Bishop Thomas at Cheyenne, Wyoming, October 9th to 13th. For the first time a group of Bishops with common problems met together for the purpose of mutual conference, quite apart from the distractions of the General Convention or the formal meetings of the House of Bishops, and the four days they spent together were so fruitful and stimulating that all who were present went away convinced of the value of this new organization, both to the work of the Bishops themselves and of the general Church.

Those present at the Council were Bishops Thomas, Page, Funsten, Sanford, Howden, Touret, Burleson and Hunting; also the new Domestic Secretary, the Rev. Francis S. White, and the Rev. Dr. Gardner, Secretary of the General Board of Religious Education. The total membership of the Council, which includes all missionary Bishops in the continental domestic field, is eighteen. Of the eleven who were absent three were detained by illness, two are with the forces in Europe, and two live on the Atlantic coast; therefore, the attendance of those who might reasonably be expected was satisfactorily large.

Among the subjects that received careful consideration by the Bishops were Church Institutions, the Indian Work, the question of a common budget, clerical education, etc. On each of these topics a paper was read, and after full discussion a series of resolutions were adopted, expressing fully the judgment of the Council for the guidance of individual Bishops or for the information of the Board of Missions, or other commission or board concerned in dealing with that matter on behalf of the Church. The "Advent Call" was very heartily approved, and all clergymen and officers of the Woman's Auxiliary were urged to make this call to prayer as effective as possible. A committee of three Bishops was appointed to consider the question of the redistribution of the provinces west of the Mississippi. A singular unanimity prevailed and every resolution passed by this Council of Missionary Bishops received a unanimous vote.

Opening of the Virginia Theological Seminary.

The ninety-fifth session of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia opened on the regularly appointed day, Wednesday, the 18th of September, 1918, so by the time this article appears in the Southern Churchman the Seminary will have been opened five weeks. The following new students have been admitted: William Nevin Elliott, candidate for orders of the Diocese of Harrisburg; Edmund Lee, postulant for orders of the Diocese of Maryland; George Mamishisho Lamsa, admitted with a view to forming a relation in due time with a bishop so that he may continue his studies for Holy Orders; Robert Alexander Magill, postulant for orders of the Diocese of Virginia; Edward Leeson Bell Pielow, candidate for orders of the Diocese of Harrisburg; Warner Henry Podesta, Jr., postulant of the Diocese of East Carolina; Ephraim Raymond de Pui, postulant of the Diocese of New York; Chester Newton Reinhard, postulant of the Diocese of East Carolina; John Linken Saunders, a presbyter of the Diocese of Arkansas, whom Bishop Winchester desires to take a special course of one year at the Seminary; Warner Armstrong Seager, postulant of the Diocese of Newark; William Clayton Torrance, postulant of the Diocese of Virginia. This gives the number of eleven new students now at the Seminary. Another, a Mr. Donovan, is expected this week, making the number of new students twelve in all. With eight men in the Senior Class and five in the Junior, the full number now connected with the Seminary for this session is twenty-five. This number is considered a good showing by the faculty for these days, when the war is calling so many of our gallant young men to the defense of liberty throughout the world.

It will be seen that, according to dioceses, Virginia, East Carolina and Harrisburg have two students respectively of those who have entered, while Arkansas, Maryland, Newark and New York have one respectively. This gives the full tale of the dioceses so far represented by new students.

On account of the serious condition brought about by the influenza in Alexandria and elsewhere, there was a feeling among the students that they could render service in helping to nurse the sick, or by assisting in any other ways where need might call. This received a ready response from the dean and faculty. Dr. Green at once interviewed the proper heads of committees in Alexandria and then laid the matter before the faculty. Accordingly a suspension of lectures was unanimously passed on Thursday morning, the 17th, to last until the present necessity had passed. Not only were conditions in Alexandria considered, but in Washington and the students' home towns. Those who preferred to go home were granted leave to do so. Eight students are rendering efficient service in Alexandria, Messrs. Bowden, Cleveland, Cox, Crosson, Magill, Powell, Pielow and Roller. This action on the part of the Seminary is much appreciated there and in other places.

Semi-Annual Meeting of Joint Commission On Social Service.

The most important matter discussed at the regular semi-annual meeting of the Joint Commission on Social Service, held in New York on October 11, was the proposed new relations with the Episcopal War Commission, which during the summer made an initial appropriation to enable the Joint Commission to secure a field secretary to undertake special work of a social service nature in connection with the war. One or two general "leads" have been indicated: first, co-operation in the surveys of war production centers now being undertaken under the auspices of an interdenominational committee, with a view to the more effective ministration of the Church to the new industrial populations growing up along the Atlantic seaboard; second, an effort to stimulate the more effective participation of parochial and diocesan forces in and about training camp communities in connection with other remedial agencies, with a particular view to making and keeping these communities clean and wholesome. Opportunities for other work are also expected to develop. It was further decided to recommend to the War Commission appropriations for one or two additional secretaries, in order that the new field of work might be more adequately covered.

Another matter considered was the participation of the Commission in the Church Student Council recently organized by the Collegiate Department of the General Board of Religious Education, which is planning to establish among Church students in our various colleges and universities a "minimum program" of activities along the lines of personal religion, missions, religious education, social service and Church extension. In response to the Council's invitation, the Commission elected two representatives to serve on the Council, the Rev. Samuel Tyler, of Rochester, N. Y., and Miss Vida D. Scudder, of Wellesley College, and voted an appropriation of $100 for the Council's 1919 budget.

Among other matters acted upon were the appointment of a special sub-committee consisting of the Rev. J. H. Melish, Mr. C. R. Woodruff and the secretary to draw up a statement on reconstruction and the Church's duty with reference thereto, while a statement submitted by Miss Scudder with reference to the present crisis was in substance approved and entrusted to a special sub-committee for revision and issuance after a referendum. To another committee was referred the suggestion of the Society of Companions of the Holy Cross that the Commission should collaborate with it in the publication of a Calendar of Social Justice now being compiled, while a request from the same society that some action be taken in the Mooney case in California was favorably acted upon. Still another committee, consisting of Bishop Fiske (chairman), Dr. Percy Dearmer, now visiting America; Professor Dickinson Miller, of the General Theological Seminary; Miss Scudder and Mr. Woodruff, was authorized to prepare a special order of worship in connection with social service, a lectionary, and such other forms of prayer and intercession as might seem desirable.

The secretary reported that, on the Commission's suggestion, the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of Connecticut was co-operating in a Child Welfare Campaign in that State under the auspices of the National Child Welfare Association. On the secretary's suggestion, further, of an increasing need of trained social workers if the Church is to register effectively in the social field, he was instructed to urge the General Board of Religious Education to help to secure the introduction into the various seminaries of systematic courses of instruction in the social interpretation of the Bible and Church history and in modern social problems and methods of service.

Reports of the year's activities, of the increasing number of college and public libraries and other educational institutions on the Commission's mailing list, of the progress of the financial campaign, especially as regards the 1 per cent. apportionment by the diocese, etc., were submitted and accepted as records of progress.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Religious Section of the Council of Defense, of which Bishop Gibson is chairman, at a meeting held in Richmond on Monday, October 21, passed resolutions asking the religious people of the State to have prayers in their family gatherings for the winning of the war and the abatement of the epidemic. It is especially desirous that these gatherings should take the place of public worship when the houses of worship are closed by authority. The joint War Relief drive, to begin November 11, was indorsed.

Woman's Auxiliary Meeting Postponed: Owing to the prevalence of Spanish influenza, the annual meeting of the Virginia Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, which was to have been held in St. James Church, Warrenton, November 6 and 7, is postponed to a date which will be announced later.

LOUISA T. DAVIS,
President and Secretary of the Virginia Branch.

The Richmond rectors rose splendidly to the unusual situation created by the epidemic. In spite of the extra amount of visiting to be done in their own congregations they have volunteered at the John Marshall Emergency Hospital in every capacity, from orderly to clerk in the supply department.

Practically all the Richmond Episcopal churches have turned their parish houses into soup kitchens. St. Philip's was the first colored church to do this in the city, and has supplied soup to hundreds of destitute.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thompson, D. D., Suffragan.

Industrial School and Farm For Homeless Boys, Covington, Va.

The report of the President, the Rev. George Floyd Rogers, to the Trustees of the Home shows good conditions generally, with a large need for further accommodations. About seventy-five boys have been given a home, training and a chance in life. New buildings about complete will enable this number to be very largely increased. It is expected to be able to occupy these new buildings this fall as the heating system is now being installed. The health of the boys has been remarkable, and on the whole the life of the Home has been admirable. Seven of the boys have entered the services of the country. The boys do all the work on the farm, which has proved very productive. The report continues:

"It has been found that the cost of living is twice as much at the Home now, and such is the case elsewhere. When the fixed charge for current support of a boy was $100 a year it barely covered the actual charges, now it is far short. The result has been, even with the best and most careful management and an increased production at the farm, a small shortage in current expenses, which if allowed to increase will become a serious embarrassment. In order to meet this situation, we have determined to set $150 as the proper charge when a community desires to send a boy to the Home, and where a case of pitiful poverty arises and this sum is not provided, to allow the entrance on the payment of the $100 or less, trusting that this may be supplemented from other sources, as we are able to make the facts known. This with the regular contributions to the Home, many of which have not been discontinued as a result of the war, though many have been and the dividends from our endowment, we believe will bring us out of the war period in reasonable shape as to current expenses. Provided all who are interested in this great effort for the salvation of boys will keep in mind the facts that war time does not diminish, but materially increases homelessness and dependency, and that it would be a social crime for us to forget the cry of the helpless at our own doors. I personally believe in our people, their ability and their purpose to meet the need, though I am frank in saying that the burdens are heavy for two reasons—having to deny help so many times when piteous appeals come—mothers sometimes traveling many miles to present their plea in person—and the care of facing a slender income to meet increasing bills. Faith in God's promised help and prayer has sustained, and I have confidence to believe to the end."

Any community, town or county that contributes for the building fund $500.00 or multiples of that sum, will be entitled to have one or more boys at the Home, according as the sum warrants.

The Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., has removed his residence from Lynchburg to Norfolk, and his permanent address will be 709 Stockley Gardens, Norfolk, Va.

Owing to the prevalence of influenza the churches in most parts of the Diocese have been closed, as well as all places of public gatherings. The epidemic seems to be getting well in hand, and it is anticipated that the order will soon be rescinded.

The Rev. Clarence E. Buxton, who for some time has been rector at Madisonville, Ky., has recently taken charge of Immanuel Church, Covington.

The Rev. T. K. Nelson, headmaster of the Virginia Episcopal School, is giving services at the Lee Memorial Church, Lexington, since the rector, the Rev. Churchill Gibson, has entered the army service as chaplain.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. G. Croft Williams, for a number of years priest in charge of St. John's Chapel, Charleston, S. C., has resigned that charge and has accepted the important position of Secretary of the Board of Charities and Corrections for the State of South Carolina. Mr. Williams has gained a prominent position in the life of Charleston during his residence. For some time he has been Chairman of the Committee of Civilian Relief and Home Service Section of the Red Cross.

The Rev. M. P. Logan, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Charleston, S. C., has returned to his parish after three months' service in Red Cross work at Camp Gordon.

All of the churches in Charleston have been closed since October 1 on account of the epidemic of influenza.

Rev. William Way, rector of Grace Church, has returned to his parish after spending a month in Philadelphia in charge of St. James' Church.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Cheshire's Twenty-fifth Anniversary as Bishop.

Joseph Blount Cheshire, fifth Bishop of North Carolina, was consecrated on October 15, 1893. The people of his Diocese had planned for a commemoration of his twenty-fifth anniversary in Tarboro on October 15, 1918. The influenza was so prevalent in the State of North Carolina that public assemblies had been forbidden. This was not contrary to the gathering of the Bishop's family and a few of his old friends in Christ Church, Raleigh, on the morning of October 15, where he celebrated the Holy Communion with his dear ones about him. The Rev. A. B. Hunter read the Gospel and the Rev. M. A. Barber, rector of the church, the Epistle. There are eight clergymen now in the Diocese who were in it when the Bishop was elected. It had been planned to have a celebration of the Holy Communion in Tarboro with a reception in the afternoon and a public service of congratulation at night, and there is still hope that such a public commemoration may take place. One of the Bishop's family was in khaki, being at home on a furlough, having been wounded in France by the accidental discharge of hand grenades. Another son is in France, and two daughters are wives of missionaries in China.

Consecration and Conference Postponed: The influenza has also caused the postponement of the consecration of the Rev. H. B. Delany as Suffragan-Bishop of North Carolina, which was to have taken place in St. Augustine's Chapel on St. Luke's day during the session of the Conference of Church Workers Among Colored People. This conference also was necessarily postponed.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Churches Merged.

Trinity (Southwark) and Zion, Eighth and Columbia Avenue, have merged under the name Zion and will worship in Trinity Church, Broad Street and Wyoming Avenue. After the property of Zion Church is sold the money will be used to erect a new church building at Broad Street and Wyoming Avenue. The Rev. Charles H. Long, St. James Church, Prospect Park, Pa., has been called as rector and accepted. He will be in residence after November 1st, in the rectory, 4644 York Road, Philadelphia.

NETHERLEIGH.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

Convocation Postponed.

Because of the epidemic of influenza the fall session of the Archdeaconry of Reading, which was to have been held at the Church of the Mediator, Allentown, the Rev. R. Nott Merriman, minister-in-charge, on Monday and Tuesday, October 14 and 15, was indefinitely postponed. In some parts of the Diocese the services of the church have been forbidden by local Boards of Health until after the epidemic.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Churches Closed: On account of the influenza epidemic now so widely prevalent, all church services, Sunday schools and gatherings of parish and general Church organizations in the diocese have been discontinued by State and city authorities until further notice. The only activity connected with the parishes that is permitted to go on is the Red Cross Auxiliaries. This regulation prevails throughout the diocese. All public funerals are prohibited, and movie shows and all other public places of amusement, as well as saloons, hotel bars and wholesale liquor houses, have been closed to remain so until the epidemic is over.

Kingsley House, some parish houses, halls of beneficial orders, buildings in the public play-grounds, are being utilized to help out the hospitals in their care of those afflicted with this scourge.

The Bishop's Illness: Bishop Whitehead has always enjoyed such remarkably good health that it was a great surprise to his people to learn that he had been obliged to go to a hospital for an operation. After a stay of three weeks' duration, he is now progressing favorably toward recovery and hopes to be able to return to his home before the end of October.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. F. Burgess, D. D., Bishop.

Miss Flor-Etta Kimball, who died of pneumonia following influenza in St. John's Hospital, Brooklyn, on October 12, was a daughter of the late Rev. W. W. Kimball, formerly rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Brooklyn, N. Y. She was in government service at the time of her death, and her name was on the honor roll of the church. A gold star will be placed on the church's service flag for her. The funeral took place from her father's old church, the Rev. A. W. E. Carrington, rector, officiating, and the interment was at Darlington, Maryland.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

The new St. Bartholomew's Church, in Park Avenue, was used for the first time on the twenty-first Sunday after Trinity. It is incomplete, and building material lies all around. The organ is not in place, and the chapel not yet ready, but it provides what is absolutely essential at this time—a place for worship by the great congregation. Bishop Greer, long rector of the parish, was present at the first service, as he had been at the corner-stone laying, and there was a large congregation.

Naturally, St. Bartholomew's is contrasted with St. Thomas, its near neighbor. First, its location is six blocks farther north than the old one in Madison Avenue. Park Avenue, an extension of Fourth Avenue, surrounds the Grand Central Station, and for some distance is a thoroughfare laid over the tracks. The avenue is a rival of Fifth Avenue, but given over more to very high-class apartments than is Fifth Avenue. The new St. Bartholomew's is at the extreme south end of the avenue, ideal in location, both for present and even more so in the future. It occupies an entire front block as St. Thomas' does not, and will have on the south an open space, with room for the chapel and a miniature yard.

The famous Vanderbilt memorial facade and doors show to far better advantage in the new than in the old location, the light being better and the perspective higher. The exterior is unlike St. Thomas', being less conventional, but it presents two colors, a queer shade and shape of brick and white stone. The effect is to cheapen and disappoint, and exteriorly most people whom your correspondent has heard express an opinion, feel it to be less ideal than St. Thomas'. While as large, it gives the impression that it is much smaller. A perfect gem architecturally as is also St. Thomas', it is not striking, and needs to be studied, as St. Thomas' pleases the most casual observer at a glance.

But when it comes to interior, St. Bartholomew's is a distinct advance on St. Thomas'. It is broken, and therefore is more homelike and is also free from the unfortunate echoes and draughts of St. Thomas'. In place of bareness, it is ornate and very beautiful. Its hearing qualities are excellent, and its spaces great and imposing. The old pews have been used, at least for the present, and so have the sanctuary furnishings in the way of pews. The great picture of Francis Lathrop, appearing in the old church above the altar, has been placed high in the north transept, and appears much smaller than of old. Over the altar in the new chancel are lancet windows with plain glass. The stained glass of the new church has not been made a conspicuous feature. The interior is wonderfully open, with no pillars of any kind to obstruct the view.

The chapel is on the south, with its own entrance from the avenue, and in the rear are spacious parish rooms, quite low buildings that do not detract from the boldness of the church itself, but on the other hand they do not hide ugly walls of neighboring cheap apartments.

With St. Thomas', the new church stands among the finest parish churches in the world. Its site and its structure cost most, and its membership and gifts stand at the top. Most people imagine the world's greatest parish churches, like the greatest cathedrals, to be in Europe. On the contrary, they are in New York. The test of greatness is work for others as compared with work for self, and on this basis no churches in the world compare for a moment with St. Bartholomew's, St. Thomas' and some denominational ones in this city. While other churches have left the field where the new St. Bartholomew's has risen, it remains, and with its greatest service to New York, America and the world ahead of it because in part it stands where it does, and not behind it. Its greatest history is yet to be written, great as its past has been.

Dr. Manning's War Service: In common with other volunteer chaplains, as ordered by the Government, the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning will soon retire from war camp work and return to his great parish in this city. The retirement of volunteer chaplains is according to a definite plan in which most Christian leaders of America concur. When there were few chaplains, volunteers were welcomed. Now the Government has been most generous in the number provided, and holds that the spiritual work for enlisted men should be placed in their hands. However, it is distinctly ordered that only the direction is to be in the hands of the chaplains, and that great preachers and leaders of the churches are to be called in to serve. On that plan it is certain that the rector of Trinity will again have part in camp activities and influence.

Perhaps it exceeds the province of a correspondent to say it, but as matter of news information it ought to be known by the Church everywhere that the work and the influence of the Rev. Dr. Manning, both in the camps and in New York, have been beyond all praise. When some others were weak-kneed, notably one or two denominational ministers of national prominence located in New York, the rector of Trinity lifted his voice to utter some of the soundest patriotic statements language can frame. Almost more than any other person he changed the tone of New York's thinking on the war.

He did so, not because rector of Trinity, but because of his personality and the opportune time he took to say what he said. He was a leader when a leader was needed. Through him the Church made a contribution to winning the war that ought always to stand, and always to be known. From the war camps there come high appreciation, but working in the war camps and only occasionally speaking in New York, his greatest work in this war has been done outside of camps, even outside of Trinity itself, and it is work that influenced all New York and the entire nation.

ERIE.

Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., Bishop.

The Spanish Influenza in Erie: All public meetings in Erie City and County and Cathedral were prohibited Saturday, October 5th, until further notice. Movies, theatres, saloons and libraries were closed at midnight. With the gasoline edict also in effect Sunday was a remarkable day, the like of which had never been known by the oldest inhabitant. The streets were deserted and the busy city was like a country village. No church bells rang and there were no services except communions for the sick. The clergy are gladly co-operating with the health authorities in this wise move of prevention.

Erie has acted quickly and there are only 250 cases in the city, but the little town of Corry nearby has 1,100 cases and in Union City also the "flu" is epidemic.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

New Orleans Churches Closed: The epidemic of Spanish influenza in New Orleans has become so serious that the city health officers have issued a proclamation closing all the churches and schools and cancelling the programs for the mass meetings in the interest of the Fourth Liberty Loan. This is the first time in the history of the city that the churches have been closed on account of an epidemic. The opinion of church-going people is very much divided as to the necessity for this drastic measure. The order, as it affected the churches, went into effect Sunday, 13th. The Rev. Dr. Capers, of Trinity, while obeying the letter and spirit of the law, at the hour of morning service, the sole occupant of his church, read from the sanctuary the Epistle and Gospel for the day, recited the Creed, read the prayers of intercession for our country, our soldiers and sailors, those for the sick of the community and epidemic. Dr. Capers said that as the services of the Church are not merely for those present, but are said on behalf of the people everywhere, that should the closing order continue, he, with only two communicants to receive, will have the early communion service as usual. This practice may be followed by all the rectors in the city.

TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop

War Activities at Waco: On the four Sunday nights in September Rev. W. P. Witsell, rector of St. Paul's Church, Waco, Tex., and his choir of mixed voices went into different sections of Camp McArthur and held services in the Y. M. C. A. buildings for the men, who attended in large numbers. The rector frequently holds a week night service in the camp, and sometimes, in addition to his three services in the parish church, conducts a regimental service for the soldiers at 9 A. M.

A sociable in honor of the men of the camp and the aviation field is held in the parish house each week.

The nurses at the base hospital are reached and served chiefly through a chapter of St. Barnabas Guild, organized by Dean White, when he was civilian chaplain in this camp. Once a month the members of the Guild and their friends from among the nurses come to the church for a service, after which there is a business and social meeting. Then, once again in the month, they meet for social purposes altogether.

By reason of the withdrawal of the regular camp chaplain, the responsibility and opportunity for service by the local clergyman have greatly increased. Hence Mr. Witsell, in order to have more time to devote to these camp duties, has resigned as Dean of the Northwest Convocation of the Diocese, as Chairman of the Missionary Committee and as Examining chaplain.

Both the rector and many of his people have been busy in promoting the Fourth Liberty Loan and other war-time activities. He and several of his men and women are on the State Advisory Committee for the United War Work Campaign to be waged November 11, 1918.

The rector took no vacation this summer, on account of the need of his services here, but has taken up the fall and winter campaign with his usual vigor.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

The work at the San Juan Indian Mission, near Farmington, is making good progress. Since last May thirty-seven patients have been cared for in the wards of the hospital—some of them seriously sick with pneumonia. In such cases it has been the saving of a life, for otherwise those sick with pneumonia would probably have died. The nurse, Miss Ireland, has also made visits to the Navajos and cared for the sick. Gradually the confidence of the Navajo Indians is being gained by the good work of the hospital, and this is a very important step in the way of winning them to the Gospel of Christ, and to Christian civilization. The Navajos are now the largest tribe of Indians in the United States, numbering about 32,000. While they are self-supporting, and not dependent upon the United States Government, as many other Indians have been, yet they are backward in many respects, and a large proportion of their children are not in school, and have received no education. Then, also, many are diseased. This makes the work of this mission highly important. The largest field for down-right missionary work among any Indian tribe is probably right here among the Navajos.

The Rev. W. B. Magnan, the newly appointed priest of the church at Farmington, has now arrived with his family. Besides doing the work among white people at Farmington and vicinity, they will be of help at the Indian Mission.

A minister without boldness is like a smooth file, a knife without an edge, a sentinel that is afraid to let off his gun. If men will be bold in sin, ministers must be bold to reprove.—W. Gurnall

THE EFFECT OF WAR ON CRIME.

A statement from London under date of October 17 by Eaton Fearn, contains the following extraordinary information:

It has always been the argument of all economics and sociologists that the most prolific cause of crime was lack of work or employment at the lowest possible wage. The above figures seem pretty conclusive evidence that this argument was well founded, and we find these significant words further along in the same article, which concludes with this warning and prophecy:

Unemployment, with its companions want and misery, is a forcing house where crime grows luxuriantly.

Nor is there much danger that these men when they return to civilian life will go back to their old "professions," provided, of course, that those in authority see to it that there shall be no lack of employment when fighting days are over.

That is the only danger, a danger that is very real from many points of view. The old conditions must not be reinstated.

Insanitary dwellings, sweating, starvation wages will all have to be scrapped. The lives of the workers will have to be brightened. More leisure will have to be afforded them for recreation and mental improvement.

Otherwise when the boys come back from the front they will ask: "What have we been fighting for?"

And then there will be real trouble.

HOW SHALL WE REACH THOSE WHO NEED THE GOSPEL?

We note the following sentences in a very interesting account of the Pittsburgh street services, which have now become a definite part of the summer church activities of that city:

"The personnel of these crowds has proved an interesting study. The bum and the degenerate have occasionally been seen. But the respectable, and in many cases the educated, have been present again and again in large numbers."

The striking part about these sentences is the congratulatory note that the "bum and the degenerate" have only "occasionally been seen," while the "respectable, and in many cases the educated, have been present again and again."

The smug, self-satisfied respectability of the average Sunday morning church congregation has long ago driven the "bum and degenerate" from the church, which was founded by Him who came "to seek and to save that which was lost."

Dean Hodges, in one of his books, says: "It is the doctrine of the devil that respectability is equivalent to righteousness, and the doctrine is one of easy and popular acceptance."

If even our street services are to be monopolized by the "respectable" and "well educated" where and how are we going to reach the "bum and degenerate," who were especially the objects of the Saviour's solicitude?

PREPARING FOR PEACE.

Two bills have been introduced into the United States Senate, the one by Senator Weeks, of Massachusetts, the other by Senator Overman, of North Carolina, both looking to the accomplishment of the same purpose by different means.

This purpose is to prepare the country for peace. Each of these bills provides for a commission with wide powers of investigation relating to the problems affecting labor, capital and credit, public utilities, demobilization of industrial and war resources, foreign trade and a long list covering practically all the questions that will arise for solution at the close of the war. The Weeks' bill places these problems under twelve heads and provides for a commissions to investigate them, composed of six senators and six members of the House of Representatives.

The Overman bill, or as it is better known, the Administration's Plan, places the subjects to be investigated under ten heads, but covers a little wider sphere. It provides that the President shall appoint a commission composed of five members to report and recommend legislation to Congress.

It is of the utmost importance that one of these plans be adopted promptly, as otherwise we are likely to come to the making of peace with as little preparation as had been provided for the making of war, and this would be almost as great a catastrophe as our plunging into the world war without an army. It is almost an impossibility to conceive of the immensity and difficulties of the questions that will present themselves for settlement upon the signing of the peace treaty.

The administration's plan offers far more likelihood of a wise solution of these matters than does the method suggested by Senator Weeks.

President Wilson has repeatedly shown his ability to select men capable of solving wisely and well any question which may present itself, no matter how complex it may be. On the other hand there are few men in either branch of Congress, who have the expert knowledge which this task will require or the time necessary to its proper accomplishment.

This commission should be formed with the utmost promptness, so that it can make at least a preliminary report within the next six months.

SHIPS OF PEACE.

No result of the world war has been more miraculous than the change wrought in the standing of the United States as a shipbuilding country. In a year's time, through Herculean efforts, we have advanced to the very first ranks in the construction of ocean going ships.

Our middle Western States, whose inhabitants before the war were essentially provincial, with their thoughts centered almost entirely upon the solving of their own local problems, are now sending thousands of their sons to man these ships.

It is an inspiring idea to think of these young Americans as missionaries carrying the good will of the United States to the four quarters of the globe when the war is over, and it is most gratifying to read these words from Ed. N. Hurley, the practical chairman of the United States Shipping Board: "The great fleet that this country is building will be operated after the war upon principles which recognize humane and national rights and equities. It will serve Latin America as it serves the peoples of the United States. It will serve the world as America is now serving the world in fighting for the cause of liberty when the war is won, as it must be if this hemisphere is to be free from the constant menace of militarism, the ships that have served their military purposes will play a large part in bringing the neighboring nations of this continent closer together and cementing the bonds of comradeship."

When God at first made man,
Having a glass of blessings standing by—
Let us (said He) pour on him all we can;
Let the world's riches, which dispersed lie,
Contract into a span.

So strength first made a way,
Then beauty flowed, then wisdom,
honor, pleasure:
When almost all was out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that, alone of all His treasure,
Rest at the bottom lay.

For if I should (said He)
Bestow this jewel also on my creature,
He would adore my gifts instead of me,
And rest in nature, not the God of Nature:
So both should losers be.

Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them with repining restlessness;
Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
If goodness lead him not, yet weariness

May toss him to my breast.

Twenty-second Sunday After Trinity:

The Sunday morning Old Testament lesson relates an incident of great historical importance: a league entered into between Judas Maccabeus on the part of the Jews and the Romans. It may be said to be the beginning of that era of Jewish history which leads up to the political conditions in existence during our Lord's ministry and has its end with the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70. This league was, says Stanley, "the chief offense which alienated from Judas Maccabeus the fanatical spirits amongst his countrymen" and "seems to have been an act of which he did not live to reap the fruits, but which indicates the opening of a new epoch in Palestine." For, "from the time that the envoys of Judas Maccabeus signed the treaty in the Senate House, . . . the Roman power continued to make its presence more and more felt throughout every corner of Syria." Judas was impressed with the power and kindness of the Romans, as well as with their democratic spirit. They had obtained the mastery over Spain and Greece and "whom they would help to a kingdom, those reign; and whom they would, they displace." But, though they were "greatly exalted," yet "for all this, none of them wore a crown or was clothed in purple to be magnified thereby"; moreover, they had "made for themselves a senate-house, wherein three hundred and twenty men sat in council daily, consulting always for the people to the end that they might be well ordered; and they committed their government to one man every year, who ruled over all their country"; yet "there was neither envy nor emulation among them."

For the New Testament lesson is given a picture of this same Roman people (at a later period) by the great Apostle of the Gentiles, a dark background of sin against which the glorious Gospel shines but the more brightly; and, as was most fitting in writing to a people who worshipped power, there is brought out that particular aspect of the Gospel, viz., its power; the power of God unto salvation; and in its nature and ultimate extent, more than fulfilling the world-wide kingdom conception of that mighty empire.

For the evening lessons that belong to the twenty-second Sunday after Trinity, may be substituted those for the eve of SS. Simon and Jude: God's servants must look for temptation and trouble, but their reward shall not fail; and (evening), the Lord's appointment of the twelve. In the same way the lessons for Thursday evening may be substituted by those for the eve of All Saints'; and, of course, the Friday lessons are those for All Saints' itself. New are Ecclus. 44:1-15 ("Let us now praise famous men"); and Revelation 21:1-22:5 ("The Lord God giveth them light and they shall reign for ever and ever").

Sts. Simon and Jude.

In the catalogue of the Apostles St. Simon is styled Simon the Canaanite, a word having no relation to his country, but signifying one full of zeal. Therefore what some of the evangelists call Canaanite, others, rendering the Hebrew by the Greek word, style Zealots, or "the Zealot." St. Simon, then, belonged to that sect or branch of the Pharisees called "the Zealots," who were great asserters of the honour of the law, and the strictness and purity of religion. In aftertimes these "Zealots" fell into ungovernable excesses, and their violent and turbulent behavior was a great cause of the fall of Jerusalem. It is probable, however, that in St. Simon's time, the Zealots

Lord, we beseech Thee to keep Thy household the Church in continual godliness; that through Thy protection it may be free from all adversities, and devoutly given to serve Thee in good works, to the glory of Thy Name; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for Saint Simon and Saint Jude's Day.

O Almighty God, who hast built Thy Church upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the head cornerstone; Grant us so to be joined together in unity of spirit by their doctrine, that we may be made an holy temple acceptable unto Thee; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for All Saints' Day.

November 1.

O Almighty God, who hast knit together Thine elect in one communion and fellowship, in the mystical body of Thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord; Grant us grace so to follow Thy blessed saints in all virtuous and godly living, that we may come to those unspeakable joys which Thou hast prepared for those who unfeignedly love Thee; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

had not reached this point of lawlessness; and if they had it only makes his call to the Apostolate the more wonderful, even as St. Matthew the Publican, and St. Paul the Pharisee and persecutor of the Church of God.

There are three names by which the Apostle Jude is described in the evangelical narrative, viz., Jude, Thaddaeus and Lebbaeus; it being usual in the Holy Scriptures to find more than one proper name given to the same person. Jude, Judas or Judah was a common name among the Jews. This name the Apostles seem afterwards to have changed to Thaddaeus, a word springing from the same root and of the same import. To prevent any possibility of mistake, and that they might not confound the righteous with the wicked, Sts. Matthew and Mark never call him Judas. Doubtless for the same reason St. Jude frequently styles himself, and is frequently called by others, "Judas the brother of James." And that this was one great design of it St. John the Evangelist plainly intimates, when in speaking of him he says, "Judas, not Iscariot." The origin and meaning of the third name, Lebbaeus, seems uncertain.

"A Christian faith in an assurance of God, and of His love, and grace in Jesus Christ. The man who has heard Christ's voice and responded to it, and has surrendered his soul to Christ's keeping and his life to Christ's guidance, is a believer."

NANCY BYRD TURNER, Editor

As little children in a darkened hall
At Christmas-tide await the opening door,
Eager to tread the fairy-haunted floor
About the tree with goodly gifts for all,
And into the dark unto each other call—
Trying to guess their happiness before—
Or of their elders eagerly implore
Hints of what fortune unto them may fall,
So wait we in Time's dim and narrow room,
And with strange fancies, or another's thought,
Try to divine, before the curtain rise,
The wondrous scene. Yet soon shall fly the gloom,
And we shall see what patient ages sought,
The Father's long-planned gift of Paradise.

The Latter Wine.

As the trembling years drop from us, carrying away so much that we hold dear, so much that has seemed to us as the very joy of our being, a strange discovery of a larger, ripper life in God that yet awaits us makes itself known. Again the wonder works, again the grace is felt, again out of our trouble—just as we feared to face our loss—there will break from our heart the adoring thanksgiving:

"I never knew before how much the love of God could restore for me. I never dreamed that life could be so strong, so glad, so free. Now, first, I taste the fullness of God's chalice. O, my God, Thou hast kept the good wine until now!"

That may be the voice of all who will sit at the marriage feast, with Jesus. How blessed if, far on in old age, when to outward eyes they seem bereft of everything that can minister to joy and hope, while each year is lessening opportunities and imposing severer limits, they still can say in silence, in the secret places of the soul, "Nay, it is better than before. The good wine has been kept until now."

And still, when at last the evil days must come, and "the years wherein it will be said, I have no pleasure in them; when the silver cord must be loosed and the golden bowl be broken, when the mourners go about the streets and the man goes to his long home," then as the soul passes out on its long journey it will find a great peace enfolding it; it will feel the everlasting arms beneath it; it will know the depths of the riches of the love of God that passes knowledge; it will look up in the face of its own dear Master and King, who has been throughout the Lord of all its joy, and say, "This is the best; Thou hast kept, O Lord, the good wine until now—this wine that I drink now for the first time with Thee in the kingdom of heaven."—H. S. Holland.

The Worsted Motto.

"I suppose you think that isn't very ornamental," said Mrs. Jennings, noticing the summer boarder's glance toward a motto, worked in worsted, that hung on the wall. "It's out of fashion, and it's faded besides; but I wouldn't think of parting with that motto. Husband's Aunt Abby worked it, and she was a saint on earth, if ever there was one.

"She brought it over one afternoon, all framed, and when husband came home he noticed it the first thing.

"Aunt Abby has been making you a present," says he.

"You've guessed pretty near right," I says, 'only it's your present just as much as mine. Aunt Abby was particular about that,' I says, and he looked a little queer.

"Husband was as kind-hearted a man as you would wish to see, besides being sober and industrious. But he had one bad habit. I presume he picked it up going on coasting vessels when he was young. He didn't mean any harm, and he had tried to break himself of it. But there! The minute anything went wrong, or he got the least grain excited, he'd out with it, no matter who was round to hear.

"However, he said he was much obliged for his share of the present, and I can seem to hear him now as he stood and read the text out loud:

"'Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my Strength and my Redeemer.'"

"The next noon when he came home from ploughing he was a sight. He had tried to steer clear of a stump, the plow had caught in the root and brought up all standing, and he'd been thrown off his feet and got his face barked something dreadful.

"And what do you suppose I said when I picked myself up?" says he. "Why," says he, 'I just repeated that motto that Aunt Abby worked, and then I felt just as reconciled as could be.' He allowed that two or three times during the forenoon he had said something worse, for he was breaking up a new piece of ground, and the horses were acting scandalous. But even then he would repeat the text right afterwards, as much as to say that he was sorry, and would try to do better; and most of the times when anything happened, he said he managed to get the motto in ahead. He said he was going to keep on that way, and he believed it would cure him.

"That very night, as we were sitting together after supper, I says, 'I don't know just what those people that have moved on to the Bates' place are going to turn out to be. Mary Davis says—'

"But before I could get any further, husband looked up to the motto, and, says he, 'Let's see—Aunt Abby's present was partly yours, wasn't it?'

"Well, I never finished the sentence, and time and again, when I've caught myself about to say something about people, I've stopped short and repeated the text to myself instead. I wish I had done it oftener than I have.

"One night husband came home from the village with the news that the schooner Minnie J. had been wrecked, and not a cent of insurance. Husband had owned a piece in the school at one time; but Captain Stiles, the chief owner, had induced him to trade it for some mining stock that hadn't turned out as well as we expected. It was on my tongue's end to say something, but I caught sight of that motto, and I shut my lips right together. As for husband, he sat down and went to drumming on the arm of his chair. Finally he drew a long breath, and says he, "Aunt Abby's motto seems to be looking down at both of us,' says he.

"Well," says I, 'I haven't said a word—nor you, either.'

"No," says he, 'but it speaks of the meditations of the heart, doesn't it?'

"For a moment I was some taken aback; and then I owned up that I was ashamed of what I had been thinking, and husband did the same. After that we soon got into a frame of mind where we could honestly feel sorry about the Minnie J.

"To tell the truth, I hadn't thought much about that part of the text before, but I've tried my best to keep it in mind ever since. Oftentimes I find it considerable of a stent, but as husband said more than once, if we can only succeed with the meditations of the heart, the rest is real easy."—Exchange.

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

XIX. Forever With the Lord.

An examination of the index of authors in the back of our hymnal will show that the name of James Montgomery occurs more frequently than any other, except that of Charles Wesley. In fact, we owe to this devout Scotch poet no fewer than eighteen hymns, several of them among the best known and best beloved of the entire collection. Montgomery's work covers a wide range of religious subjects; he has given us hymns for Advent, Christmas and Holy Week; for the Ember Days and the feast of All Saints; for the ordination service and the sacrament of the Holy Communion; funeral hymns, Sunday-school hymns, hymns for the family circle and for the closet.

And yet, though he has run almost the whole gamut of the needs of our varying ritual, Montgomery was not a member of the Church of England. Born in Ayrshire, Scotland, he was placed, when little more than a baby, in a Moravian school in Yorkshire, England. Upon this period of his life, as upon a pivot, turned the whole destiny of the man.

The religious training that he received at the school had a far-reaching effect. In his early manhood he drifted away from its influence for a while, and passed through the initial stages of carelessness and indifference into downright skepticism. But no man who drinks of a pure fountain in his youth ever utterly forgets the sweet taste of its waters. In the midst of his unrest Montgomery wrote to a friend: "What can I do? I am tossed to and fro on a sea of doubts and perplexities." Yet this very restlessness was a sign of grace; he was not so full of despair that he failed to remember his childhood's faith. On his forty-second birthday he applied for re-admission to the Moravian congregation, and at once found himself back in his old fields of spiritual content.

From that time on until his death at an advanced age he stayed steadfast. His numerous hymns are imperishable records of what religion can mean to a soul for forty years. "O Where Shall Rest Be Found," "Call Jehovah Thy Salvation," and that little prayer of humble dependence, "Lord Forever at Thy Side," are a few of the hymns that make up our invaluable heritage from this poet.

But it is in the hymn reproduced below, "Forever With the Lord," that Montgomery touches high-water mark. The poem is beautiful as literature—in all English verse there is scarcely a metaphor more striking than the pilgrim picture of the second stanza; but

It is more than that, also. It is a triumphant paradox—a funeral hymn full of passionate rejoicing, a requiem that is like a trumpet cry. Although not listed as a burial hymn, it belongs pre-eminently in that class, speaking in anticipation for the living and in retrospection for the dead. It is from the first word to the last the glad proclamation of the soul that can look on dissolution undismayed. Set to Sir Arthur Sullivan's brave music it seems veritably a metrical version of St. Paul's immortal challenge, O Death, where is thy sting!

Forever with the Lord!

Amen! So let it be!

Life from the dead is in that word,
And immortality!

Here in the body pent,

Absent from Him I roam,

Yet nightly pitch my moving tent

A day's march nearer home.

My Father's house on high,

Home of my soul, how near,

At times, to faith's foreseeing eye,

Thy golden gates appear.

Ah, then my spirit faints

To reach the land I love,

The bright inheritance of saints,

Jerusalem above.

Then, then I feel that He,

Remembered or forgot,

The Lord is never far from me.

Though I perceive Him not.

And when my latest breath

Shall rend the veil in twain,

By death I shall escape from death,

And life eternal gain!

Dependence Upon God.

There is one outcome of our present hard experience which it would seem right to expect, that is, an increased sense of dependence upon God. We have been sharply reminded of the weakness of our Christian civilization, of the feebleness of the bonds which trade and commerce, religion and education, make to maintain peace; of the insecurity of the order of the world's life, of which we have been proud. We had supposed that the nations nominally Christian had been tamed so that hatred, cruelty and war were restrained, and now our work has fallen down about us and the revelation of our weakness and insecurity has come.

Many dangers have come at home which we thought were entirely past, because of our means of communication, the development of our industries, and the progress of science, and we have learned now how dependent we are as regards the most necessary things in life. A season of extremely cold weather last winter made untold suffering because of the lack of coal, which is but a few hundred miles away from us. We are dependent for our food upon fields far away, and the interruption of transportation made great distress or something worse in our great cities. We have built up a great and marvelous order of trade and commerce, and we find how easily it may be disarranged and how near starvation we are.

Whether men recognize their true relation to God, they are feeling as perhaps never before their helplessness and their dependence on the Power above Who orders everything in this world. That is one of the very first things for men to learn. We have not the sense of dependence that was felt in the simple days of the Old Testament or in the days not so far back of us, when the fields about the villages and towns provided largely for the simple needs of the people.

Without being too confident as to what the war may mean for religion, while hopeful for good, there will be a response in the minds and hearts of the people to the presentation of the thought of our absolute dependence upon God. People are feeling this as never before, and it makes a good foundation on which to build up true regard for God and all that enters into the making of a good character and a good life.—Newark Churchman.

The Halo of Life.

In the very interesting book of reminiscences which was written by Mrs. Sellar a few years ago she gives some recollections of Susan Ferrier. And she tells how Susan Ferrier was once asked to write her greatest wish in somebody's birthday book. And this is what she wrote: "That life for me may never lose its halo." I think it was a magnificent and fruitful ambition. It was her desire that the mystic light might continually rest upon everything. She wanted every lane to be the beginning of a road that leads into the infinite. She wanted every commonplace thing to issue in wonder. Nothing must be completely analyzable, a thing that can be perfectly measured and weighed. There must always be something in everything to make her catch her breath. There must be a halo. . . .

And now I want to pass to a particular aspect of Susan Ferrier's aspiration, which she wrote in the birthday book of her friend. It is heedful not only that we see the halo resting on others, but that we also see it on ourselves. It is possible that my readers are thinking that there is no need of counsel of that kind. Everybody is competent and perfectly ready to see the halo which shines round his own head. But I am not now referring to the pasty diadem which is the creation of an offensive pride. I am not referring to the halo which we imagine we see when we gaze into a mirror. That is a poor, fictitious thing which will be like a flimsy fairy lamp on the first rainy night. I am not referring to the halo which can be blown out by adverse circumstances, but the halo which is independent of the passing season and which shines by night and day. I do not mean the halo conferred by a listening senate or by a wonderful crowd or by a university convocation or by an admiring ball-room.

I mean the halo conferred by our God, when He called us His children and created us in His own image. I mean the halo of heavenly sonship to be seen even when we have wandered into the far country. "I will arise and go to my father!" There the halo is shining and terrible circumstances, when its wearers have been deserted by his friend and "no man came unto him." It is a tremendous moment when the soul awakes to see the mystic halo resting upon its own being, and it is still more momentous when the soul rises up to claim the inheritance of which the halo is the symbol and the clue. "My God, I am thine; what a glory divine!" That man has seen the halo and has entered upon his inheritance.

And then I think we are designed by the Lord to see the halo on common human experiences. For instance, we have partially lost our sight unless we can see the mystic significance of common labor. Many a man can see the sacred symbol of a crossier, who is blind to the similar significance in a spade. We attach the title "Reverend" to a minister, but we have no such conception of a grocer. We see the glory resting upon the church, but we do not see the mystic flame in the workshop and the office. I am always impressed by a suggestion that comes to me in "The Angelus," the familiar picture where two peasants are standing in the field resting for a moment from their labor. There is a church upon the horizon, and from the tower there has come the summons which makes the toilers stand in the attitude of homage and intercession. But the painter has brought a ray of light and flung it upon the barrow and the spade, the implements of labor. And that is what we ought to see when we go to our daily toil. There must not only be a light on the sanctuary, but there must be a sign of the divine thought and care upon the commonest implements and ministries with which we earn our daily bread. "Only a laboring man!" Yes, only a carpenter of Nazareth.—J. H. Jowett, in Continent.

Gospels of a Day.

The reason why so many gospels have been doomed to become gospels of yesterday has been because they have addressed themselves to what is transient or partial in human nature, and not to what is permanent and universal. Men have been hailed as saviors of society, because they have been able to give relief from a need pressing at some particular time, or because their doctrines have fallen in with some passing phase of popular sentiment. But the glory of Christianity is that its teaching is addressed to what is most characteristic in human nature and absolutely the same in all members of the human race, whether they be rich or poor, whether they inhabit the one hemisphere or the other, and whether they live in ancient or in modern times.—J. Stalker.

Our Duty.

How much, if work is to be effective, depends in military service upon the little things! The smallest detail overlooked may mean a military disaster. What is true in these respects is equally, though perhaps not so apparently, yet vitally true in every day life. Duty is always closely associated with the small things. If we let no minor detail go by default we need not fear failure in the greater tasks. If we are scrupulously careful concerning the little things of accuracy and correctness in habits we need not fear our general reputation for accuracy and effectiveness. So in the question of daily duties and our every-day obligations, whether it be in social or business life, if we are careful and accurate concerning the little things the greater things of life will naturally take care of themselves.—Young Folks.

One of the surprises that God treats us to in the course of our life, which will no doubt be also the overwhelming surprise of our first review of this life from the vantage-ground of a larger and better, consists in the disclosure of the way in which our anonymous Lover has been besetting us behind and before, and laying His hand upon us. How many restraints that make for salvation have never been registered in the consciousness or printed off on the memory! How many times there are when qualification for duty is given concerning which we shall by and by hear the voice saying, "I girded thee, though thou hast not known me?"—J. Rendel Harris.

On the Other Side.

Near a shady wall a rose once grew,
Budded and blossomed in God's free
light;

Watered and fed by morning dew,
Shedding its fragrance day and night.

As it grew and blossomed, fair and tall,
Slowly rising to loftier height,
It came to a crevice in the wall,
Through which there shone a beam of light.

Onward it crept with added strength,
With never a thought of fear or pride.
It followed the light through the crevice's length,
And unfolded itself—On the Other Side.

The light, the dew, the broadening view,
Were found the same as they were before,

And it lost itself in beauties new,
Breathing its fragrance more and more.

Shall claim of death cause us to grieve
And make our courage faint or fall?
Nay, let us hope and Faith receive;
The rose still grows beyond the wall,

Scattering fragrance far and wide,
Just as it did in days of yore;
Just as it did on the other side,
Just as it will forevermore.

What Happened to Jennie's Letter.

J. B. L.

I am a letter, and the writing on the front of me says I'm going to Miss Sally Phillips,
Warren, Virginia.

I was written by a plump, little, blue-eyed girl named Jennie Bolling. She did not want to write me at first, but after she had started, and I grew longer and longer, she seemed pleased with me, and kept adding to me. Several things called "postscripts" she put on me, one saying, "Write soon, don't forget," another, "Oh, won't we have fun!" and another, "excuse this stupid letter." Now this last was very unkind, I thought, for I did not write myself. So why should I be called stupid?

Little Jennie Bolling, after sealing me up and putting a pretty red stamp on me, dropped me in a mail box on the corner just outside her house.
There I lay for a long time, with other letters which I'm sure were all my cousins, for they looked so much like me.

"Ouch!" cried a fat, blue envelope crossly when I fell in among them. "I wish you would not drop on me like that! Though I'm stout, I can be hurt.
Get along, won't you?"

"Don't think you can move on us, please," said a thin white letter haughti-ly, speaking for herself and a small envelope close beside her. "Though we are thin, we can be hurt."

As I could not move at all, I felt very unhappy, and wondered if all newcomers in the box were treated in this way. No other mail came in for me to find out, however, and I was glad when the postman came. He gathered us all up into one big handful and dumped us into a bag in his automobile wagon. I fell on top, and, away under the bottom, I could hear the three cross letters still quarreling.

Finally, after a journey on the train,
I was put off at a quiet country station. And I was glad to leave the fussy letters and get out into the cool, green world. I was taken, later, in a man's pocket, to a country house and handed to such a pretty little girl. Remembering my address, I thought,
"This must be Sally Phillips." And, sure enough the man called out,
"Come, Sally, here's a letter for you."

"A letter for me? Oh, I'm so glad!"
And running forward she clasped me eagerly in her small hands. I felt so happy at this warm welcome that I rolled myself out as smoothly as I could for her to read me. It took her some time, for she was just a little girl, but she seemed to enjoy me, and when at last she finished she jumped up and down gleefully.

"Oh, mother!" she cried, running to that lady on the porch. "Jennie is coming! Won't we have fun?" (Here I thought she was reading me and I rattled in her hand with pride.)

But she went on talking to her mother about the fine time she and Jennie would have, wading in the creek, picking daisies, playing with their dolls, riding her pony, and a dozen other things, while I lay on her lap forgotten.

At last Sally's mother said, "Let me see Jennie's letter. It seems to be quite a long one." And she picked me up and read me. When she had finished she turned back to Sally. "I don't think she need call this a stupid letter!
It's very well written for a child of her age."

How proud I was, and again I rattled. But not long did my pride remain. Sally's baby brother came out of the house and went up to his mother. Seeing me in her hand, he took me and toddled around the porch with me, making, I thought, very foolish sounds. When he came near the edge of the porch he leaned over and dropped me. And I fell—into the gutter! It was half full of water after the morn-ing's rain, and immediately my black letters ran and ran, spreading all over the front of me.

"Tommie!" exclaimed Sally reproachfully, "look what you did!" And she ran and fished me out, muddy and dripping.

She carried me to her room and laid me on a chair in front of her fire to dry. "Pride goes before a fall," she said to her mother, who followed her.
They soon went out and left me, and here I am, very warm and comfortable, beside Sally's fire. The door is open behind me, and the draught blows me nearer and nearer the hearth, but I don't mind, for I'm still a little damp around my edges. * * * My gracious!
that last whiff of wind almost blew me over into the fire! I don't think I'm quite as comfortable as I was. * * *
Here comes another puff of wind. I

Janey's Fairy.

Little Janey sat on the doorstep of the adobe ranch-house, looking at the jagged, saw-tooth mountains that seemed to form a great wall all round the edges of the moonlit desert.

"Oh, dear," she sighed, "I'm tired of playing pretend about giants. The mountains do look like giants' castles, and the big rocks look 'xactly like giants, but I don't like giants much

'cause they're big and ugly.

"I'd rather pretend about fairies—they're little and beautiful and sort of folksy. But I s'pose fairies wouldn't think of living in such a wild country."

Suddenly two big homesick tears splashed down on to the sand at her feet.

Janey could not help laughing when she saw the two little wet spots shining on the dry sand.

And then she noticed something else on the sand that was very strange.

"Oh," she cried softly after a closer look, "oh, oh, oh! Why, it's little fairy footprints, just as plain as plain can be. And here are two more, and here, and here, and here!"

For a time she was puzzled by a queer little third mark behind each pair of tiny footprints, but all at once she laughed in delighted understanding.

"Why, that's the mark of the fairy's wand, of course."

Father and mother had driven to town after supper, so Janey found good Maria, the Mexican cook, and asked permission to follow the fairy's trail.
Maria could understand very little that Janey said, but she felt sure that no harm would come to the little girl in the big out-of-doors.

"Si, si," she said, patting Janey's curly head, and Janey knew that she meant to say yes.

On tiptoe, the little girl followed the fairy footprints, now in a straight line, now circling round a giant cactus.

On and on she went till she came to a little round door in a low mound under a Spanish bayonet plant.

"Here is the fairy's house," said Janey. "I'll hide behind this Spanish bayonet and wait until I see the fairy."

"I wonder if she sleeps in the white flower bells sometimes?" thought Janey.

"I wonder if her wand is all of gold —and does she wear a little crown?"

Very quietly she sat and waited.
Presently the soft breeze began to murmur drowsily, then the white flowers of the Spanish bayonet nodded their heads, oh, so sleepily, and its rustling leaves seemed to sing a lullaby.

Janey's head had begun to nod, too,
before she saw the fairy.

How long she watched the fairy Janey did not know, when with a sudden start she heard the sharp beat of horses' hoofs on the hard road.

"Father, mother," she called, "come quick and see my fairy!"

The horses were pulled up sharply and in a moment the little girl was in her father's arms.

"Why, Janey, daughter, whatever were you doing?" he asked in surprise.

As they drove home Janey told the story of the trail of the fairy's footprints, of the little house under the Spanish bayonet, and of how beautif-fully the fairy had danced in the moonlight.

"Oh, Janey, sweetheart, surely you fell asleep and dreamed it all," said Janey's mother.

"What did the fairy look like?" asked Janey's father.

"Well," said the little girl thoughtfully, "at first I thought it was only a queer little mouse. It had a white vest and a yellowish black fur coat and a long tail with a teensy feather-duster on the end of it.

"It can't have been a mouse, because after it danced it sat near its little door and sang a song for me, the most beautiful little bird song in all the world. And that's how I knew that it must truly be a fairy in disguise."

"What you saw," said Janey's father, "must have been one of the little creatures known as the Kangaroo rat."

"But the song," objected Janey's mother.

"As to that," was the reply, "I have read that an occasional mouse of even the common house variety can sometimes sing a strange bird-like song. Our little girl has had an experience almost as wonderful as if she had really seen a fairy."

"Well," said Janey, "even if it was only a little mouse, it was as lovely as a fairy. I'm glad that I saw it and heard it sing."

"Perhaps," she added, "I can find some of the little mouse's footprints to show you in the morning."

And sure enough she did.—Sunday School Times.

The Hallowe'en Fairies.

Just how it happened that the kindling man brought the fine big load of kindling up to Mrs. Mason's house on the very afternoon of Hallowe'en is hard to tell. Of course he didn't know that Mr. Mason was away from home, and that there wasn't a man that Mrs. Mason could hire to carry it into the cellar before night. Kindling was hard to get, and this was to last them all winter.

Mrs. Mason had on her hat and coat, ready to go downtown, when the man drove up, so as soon as he had unloaded the wood she ran over to Mrs. Taylor's, across the street.

"I just have to go downtown on business," she explained, "but I'm leaving you my door-key, and if you should happen to see any man that might put that wood away for me, I'll pay him well and I'll thank you ever so much. I saw Tom and Ben looking at it as they went by to school, and then they whispered and laughed, so I think they were planning a Hallowe'en joke on us."

"What did Mrs. Mason mean about that Hallowe'en joke?" asked Bobby Taylor.

"She meant," answered his mother, "that boys and girls play very unkind tricks on Hallowe'en, and some of them may think it is a fine joke to carry away all that nice, dry kindling tonight, and scatter it so that Mr. Mason never can gather it up again. If they knew how much more fun it is to be fairies or brownies, that slip about and do kind things and make happy surprises for people, of course they would never do the wrong kind."

Bobby looked at the big pile of kindling, and then he thought of something.

"Mother, mother!" he cried, "why can't Kenneth and I be Hallowe'en fairies and put in that wood? I'll go right over to his house and ask him." And as soon as mother said "That would be a beautiful joke," away he flew.

Kenneth brought his little wagon and the two boys went to work. Mrs. Taylor opened the cellar door and helped them carry in the first two or three loads.

It wasn't very long before their backs and their arms were tired, but they didn't stop.

"What are you doing?" asked Tom, as he and Ben came past on their way from school.

"We're playing a Hallowe'en joke on Mrs. Mason," giggled Bobby.

"Come on and help," invited Kenneth.

The next time that Mrs. Taylor looked out of her window she saw two big boys helping two little boys and she smiled happily. She had to go over and help a little, or Mrs. Mason might have come back before the last stick of wood was safely in.

When at last Mrs. Mason came hurrying home how four boys who were watching her from Mrs. Taylor's window laughed to see her surprised face! A few minutes later she walked into Mrs. Taylor's kitchen, where four tired boys were eating apples and fresh cookies, and then she knew what had happened.

"That was lots of fun," said Tom, as they ran home.

"Lots more fun than what we meant to do," said Ben.

And when, the next day, each of the four boys received a book of fairy stories marked, "From your friend, the Hallowe'en Witch," they laughed again, and it didn't take very hard guessing to know that Mrs. Mason was the witch. —Louise M. Oglevee.

Whose Were the Butternuts?

Abby Ann stayed with Great-Aunt Abby Ann all summer that year, and into the fall. She enjoyed the country very much indeed—blueberrying, and milking, and making cowslip balls and daisy chains in the summer, and the little red school and nutting in the fall.

"I never knew that there were so many nuts in the world, Aunt Abby Ann," little Abby Ann said. "There are shagbarks, and chestnuts, and black walnuts, and pignuts, but the nicest of them all are your butternuts in the south pasture."

"Yes, they are," Aunt Abby Ann said. "They are good in taffy, and in cookies, and to eat with maple-sugar."

"Oh! are they?" shouted Abby Ann, clapping her hands. "Then I am going to gather as many butternuts as I can, and make a pile of them for the winter in the wood-shed."

So that is what Abby Ann did. She filled her apron, and her pockets, and her baskets with butternuts, and she piled them in one corner of the wood-shed, ready for winter.

It was very strange, though, about the butternuts in the wood-shed. The larger Abby Ann made the pile one day, the smaller it would be the next day. Even Aunt Abby Ann was puzzled.

"It looks as if some one were taking your butternuts, Abby Ann," she said.

One morning, very early, Abby Ann saw who it was. He was no larger than a doll, but quicker than Abby Ann herself. In his red fur coat and cap, he was busy in the wood-shed, carrying one butternut at a time and storing them in cracks in the stone wall outside.

"Come quick," Abby Ann called, softly.

Aunt Abby Ann came, and she laughed. "Why! that squirrel has lived in the trunk of the butternut tree for years," she said. "He thinks he owns those nuts, I fancy."

The red squirrel heard them then and ran off, whisking his long tail and looking back as much as to say, "You're the thief, not I."

Abby Ann thought and thought. "That squirrel needs butternuts more than I do. I shall have apples, and baked potato, and oatmeal, and all kinds of things to eat this winter. All he will have is nuts," she said to herself.

Then she divided the butternuts that were left into two equal parts, and half she took back and put in a neat little heap under the butternut tree.

"I shall always share with the squirrel after this," Abby Ann decided.

The squirrel must have understood.

He gathered up and hid all the butternuts that Abby Ann gave him, and he never came to the wood-shed again.—Carolyn S. Bailey.

Grace Over an Apple.

Rain wet it,
Sun warmed it,
Leaves hid it,
Naught harmed it.
Stars watched it,
Dews brushed it,
Sap sugared it,
Red flushed it.
Birds knew of it,
Winds tossed it
To and fro.
The bough lost it.
I found it,
Mellow and sweet—
God bless it
Before I eat!

The "Any-Time" Girl.

"Have you the book Mrs. James lent you, Helen?" called mother from the foot of the stairs. "She's here for it now."

"Oh, how awful of me!" a repentant voice cried, as repentant, hasty footsteps came down the stairs. "I'm so sorry! I thought I could return it any time, Mrs. James. Do please excuse me."

And Mrs. James politely refrained, as she took the book, from saying that she had already waited more than a month for its return, and that "any time" was a most doubtful date.

"You know you owe me ten cents' car fare, Helen," Mary Willis remarked at college that same fall. Mary's chief characteristic was frankness.

"I'll pay you any time," Helen promised, and Mary, who knew also all too well that "any time" was cents in person, and lent no more car fares.

"I really can't understand, Mr. Woods, why I'm deficient in English," Helen complained to her instructor at the close of the first semester. "I've never done such good work before."

"But there was an overdue theme," he explained. "It's never been handed in, you see, and I can't give you credit until I have received it."

"Oh, that!" cried a much aggrieved but secretly relieved girl. "You see, I thought there was no hurry about that. I supposed I could do it any time."

"We're very sorry to put some one else in as chairman of the Park Committee, Miss Norris," said the president of the Village Improvement Society one day when Helen's college days were over. "You see, we've waited for you to attend to planting the flowers over there, but you didn't do it, and then there were the swings for the children. I don't believe we can wait much longer, really."

"It was careless of me about the flowers," admitted a much embarrassed and not wholly agreeable young lady, "but I thought the swings could be attended to any time."

"That girl who is visiting Mrs. Stone is so attractive, mother," said Helen. "There are so few congenial people in town that I'd like to get acquainted. I believe I'll call some afternoon and ask her to come to see me."

But a call which could be made "any time" was never made at all. The attractive girl with Mrs. Stone met other girls with whom she sewed and walked and motored and played tennis. She met Helen Norris, too, and Helen said:

"I've been meaning and meaning to call, Miss Jarvis, but you know how it is in the summer time, I'm sure. Please don't stand on formality. We never do here. Just come over for supper any time, won't you?"

Miss Jarvis accepted politely, of course. What else could she do? She told Mrs. Stone that evening that she found Helen Norris very attractive, that she would like to know her better.

"Only, you see," she said, "any time" invitations are so hard to accept."

So the summer passed, and by the time the "any time" invitation was ornamented by a day and hour, Mrs. Stone's guest had gone, and a friend which might have been made had gone also.

And all because of an "any time" girl.—The Wellspring.

Richard's Friends.

When the baseball club known as the "Victors" heard that Richard Ebbert was ill, they postponed a very important game of ball to consider how they could help him. Richard was a good boy of thirteen, who peddled papers and helped his mother, who was a widow, while the "Victors" were little lads of six and seven. And the reason they felt so interested was that Richard had been their friend and champion, and when a crowd of rough boys wanted to break up their game and drive them from their little field he always routed the bad boys.

"Mamma says Mrs. Ebbert will have an awful hard time now that Richard is ill," said Claude dolefully. "I wish I hadn't spent all my money for this mask. I'd take him some oranges or something."

"My mamma says Richard always earned enough for the rent," said Joe. "Now there's nobody to carry his papers."

"Let us carry the papers!" cried Tom eagerly. "We can earn the money and give it to Richard's mother."

"No one of us could budge that big sack," said Leonard.

"We'll each take a street and it won't be a load for anybody. We can do it," said George.

Like a flash they sped down the street, and very soon they were talking over the plan with Mrs. Ebbert. She helped them divide the patrons so each of the nine boys could take a street or two, and without thinking very much about the game they had on hand they were out delivering the papers.

"A new paper boy?" said an old lady, peering at Tom with her near-sighted eyes. "I don't know about this. I've had Richard for years, and I don't want to change."

"Richard is sick, ma'am, and I am helping till he gets well," said Tom eagerly.

"Is that so? Well, I'm glad Richard has such good friends. You may bring the paper every day and here is the pay in advance. I will send some fruit to Richard this very day. I didn't know he was ill."

Up and down the streets the boys went, explaining and delivering, until the whole village was interested in the sick boy. Flowers and good things to eat and fruits fairly rained down in the little cottage, and Richard said he would have to hurry and get well to see all his kind friends.

"I can never thank the 'Victors' enough," he said as he lay propped up in a big chair out under the old apple tree. "They did so much for me, and all I ever did for them was to drive away some boys who were mean to them."

"That was a bigger thing than we did," cried all the boys. "You just remember, Richard, that we stand by our friends, and you are the best boy friend we have in this town. Take your time to getting well, and we'll look after the papers. We have twenty new subscribers for you, and there'll be lots more before you're back at work. Most of the boys make fun of us, but you were always our friend."

"I'll never forget you," said Richard. "I tell you, it pays to have friends like these, doesn't it, mother?"

Mrs. Ebbert put her arms about Richard, and looked gratefully upon the boys. With glistening eyes she quietly said something the boys remembered for a long time.

"Boys, it's the greatest thing in the world. Just fill your life with helpful things done out of love for others, whether they can repay it or not; God will mark those deeds down in heaven and they will never be forgotten."—Hilda Richmond, in Sunday School Times

The Praise Song.

Edward had a new top that he was showing to Howard, and Tom peeped over Roy's shoulder to see it, so none of the boys sang the opening hymn that morning at Sunday school. When the lesson time came their teacher said: "Yesterday, when I was downtown, I met Tony, the little Italian boy whose father has the fruit stand. His eyes were shining and he could hardly wait to tell me about Mr. Fisk, the music teacher, who gave him a little violin and is going to teach him to play. 'Wasn't he good to me?' Tony asked, and wherever he went he was telling about that kind friend, and praising him."

"I'd praise that kind of friend, too," said Tom.

"Are you quite sure?" asked his teacher.

"Of course I am," said Tom, and the other boys nodded their heads.

Then the teacher with a queer little smile went on talking. "This morning," she said, "a Friend gave you a good breakfast, a home, loving friends, good health—things worth more than all the violins in the world—and yet, when we came to His house, I didn't hear one of my boys join in the song of praise and thanksgiving that the others sang. You love Him just as truly as the others, I know, but today will be better and happier if we tell Him so. You and I like to have our friends thank us for what we do for them, and we ought to treat the dear Lord Jesus as well as we want our friends to treat us."

Then together they softly repeated the words of the song. And the next Sunday morning every boy sang so heartily that the teacher sang an extra little praise song away down in her heart.—The Sunbeam.

Riddle.

Riddlemaree, stumpy and black,
They always move in a double track;
Each is exactly like his brother,
Neither is good without the other.
Tongues they have, but they never talk;
Though they own no feet, they can run and walk—

The tighter you tie them, the swifter they be—

Who can read my riddlemaree?

Answer to last week's riddle: An autumn leaf.

A Game to Play.

Capturing the Leaves will surely keep you warm, because it calls for very swift running. The players are divided into two groups, numbered alike, that stand at opposite sides of the playground. Directly between them and dividing the playground into two equal parts, there should be a dividing line.

Each child before the game has provided himself with a large, bright autumn leaf, and he lays this a yard or so inside of the dividing line. At a signal the two groups of players run, and each tries to capture one of the leaves that belongs to a player of the opposite side. He may take only one, and if he is tagged in the attempt by a player on the opposite side, he must go back to the place without taking the leaf.

The players must run back to their place almost immediately, so it takes quick effort to capture a leaf without being tagged. A player, however, keeps a captured leaf and may try to get another the next time. The side that first captures all the leaves wins the game.—The Mayflower.

RICHARD WOOLFOLK WALDROP.

Phillips Brooks sometimes used to regret the publicity in which he passed his days. He loved the virtues that flourish best in private life, and in the domestic circle. Rarely have these virtues been more beautifully illustrated than in the life of RICHARD WOOLFOLK WALDROP. It is true that he had played his part faithfully in his youth as a soldier of the Confederacy, for a cause that was ever dear to his heart, and had always been faithful to his manhood's engagements. Still the strength of his life ran into his affections, and no one could be said to have known him, who had not seen him in his home. Married to a woman of singular powers of initiative, he knew how to appreciate her worth, and make her happy. After her death he held together his home, and guided by his love and counsel their children. Things pure, lovely and honorable were ever in his thoughts. The sorrows and trials of life had no power to embitter his nature, or dim his Christian hope.

In Memoriam.

MISS BETTIE MACON STEPTOE.

"Another star in the Saviour's crown,
Another angel in heaven"

This dear loved aunt left us in the morning of July, 1918, at the advanced age of eighty-five. We could not mourn for her nor could we scarcely call it death. It was but a simple transition; a passing through the open door into the eternal home. Her life was a long, useful and beautiful one. Bright, cheerful, unselfish, generous to a fault, she contributed to the happiness of all about her. Though for many years confined to her room, and in need to her chair, for she could not walk without assistance. She was uncomplaining, patient and cheerful, convincing us of the fact that we can be happy in affliction and make others happy. The writer can recall so many pleasant visits to the dear aunt. Her brightness and remarkable memory made her very interesting and attractive to her many friends. Around her circled the life of the home, where she will be so sadly missed. The three sisters, Miss Bettie, the late Miss Anna and Mrs. Fannie Radtke, made their home together in Lynchburg. In this lovely family she was most tenderly cared for, and their affectionate interest in her was most beautiful to behold.

She was very fond of young people. She loved to have them gather around her chair to hear them talk, and they would bring her fruits and flowers, which she dearly loved.

She was a devoted member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church. The church service was her delight, even in her days of feebleness, and when she was deprived of the privilege and pleasure of "going up to the house of the Lord." She was found at service time with her Prayer Book in her hand going through the service.

To her the summons came suddenly and found her waiting. She died as she had lived, without a struggle, and as she was laid to rest in the old family plot on that beautiful July afternoon amid the singing of birds, we knew there was one chorister more in Heaven, but how empty our hearts are, for we know too that one of the truest, most loyal hearts has gone from among us.

"Sleep on beloved, sleep and take thy rest;
Lay down thy head upon thy Saviour's breast;
We love thee well, but Jesus loved thee best;
Good night! Good night! Good night!"
—Nena Steptoe Segar.

JOHN LANGBOURNE WILLIAMS.

John Langbourne Williams, aged fifteen, died at the home of his parents, 826 West Franklin Street, a victim to volunteer service in fighting the Spanish influenza epidemic, now raging in Richmond. He was a grandson of the late John L. Williams, of Richmond, for whom he was named, and a son of Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Randolph Williams. The funeral took place from the home Thursday, October 17, at five o'clock, the interment followed in the family plot at Hollywood, Troop 5 of the local Boy Scouts, headed by Scoutmaster Benjamin T. Lecompt, attended in a body.

The Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., of Baltimore, and the Rev. Valentine Lee, rector in charge of St. Paul's, officiated at the services.

Enrolled As a Martyr.

Commenting on the sad death of the little victim to duty, Scout Executive Weaver to-day said: "John L. Williams can be put down as a true martyr. He sacrificed his life, which is the supreme sacrifice, in ministering personally as a volunteer worker to such infected persons suffering from the present plague in Richmond, as it was found necessary to take for treatment to John Marshall Hospital. "It was John L. Williams who first reported to me the seriousness of the epidemic situation in Richmond and who suggested that the Boy Scouts place an ambulance on the streets to assist the health authorities in fighting the influenza. His recommendations were acted on at once, as he was a boy upon whose judgment I had learned to rely.

"It was last Tuesday a week ago that young Williams first volunteered for duty and went on service at the Emergency Hospital as a day worker. I understand that his parents were not aware of his action until the following night, when he was cautioned not to expose himself at the hospital. On the following day, which was Wednesday, the Boy Scouts' ambulance corps was organized. Young Williams was to have been the driver. He was taken ill with the malady, with fatal results. He is as much a hero as if he had been killed in action leading a charge on the French front."

When little John L. Williams first volunteered for service at the Emergency Hospital he was accompanied by his first cousin, Berkeley Williams, son of Berkeley Williams, of Richmond. Young Berkeley was also stricken, but he is now recovering.

John L. Williams was not only popular and ranked high with the Boy Scout organization, but was recognized as a leader both at school and out of it, among boys. Last June he was awarded the Joseph Bryan medal for leadership at Chamberlayne school.

A continual procession of friends of the little fellow and of his family all morning called with floral tributes and cards at the home of his parents.

"And when the soul begotten
Shall render up once more,

The Kingdom to the Father,
Whose own it was before.
Then glory yet unheard of Shall shed abroad its rays,
Resolving all enigmas
An endless Sabbath day."

Editorially, the News Leader printed the following:

JACK WILLIAMS, LEADER.

Jack Williams did not need the splendid death the news records to gain him Richmond's love. He had it already. It was not solely because he bore his distinguished grandeur's name. It was not because he had a rare, blonde, boyish beauty, with eyes that danced and dazzled. It was rather because you never looked at the lad but that he seemed growing before you into the strong manhood of stalwart leadership. You felt that he was a boy who would never surprise you, any more than he would disappoint you. His future was written in his face and heralded in his smile and graven in every convolution of that busy brain he carried on his well-poised shoulders. To see him was to take heart for Richmond's hereafter.

The achievement of his fifteen years was, like his age, less than that of those Richmond worthies whose passing is from time to time recorded in these columns. He won the Joseph Bryan prize for leadership, the highest honor of his school, and he was a first-class Scout—a small catalogue, to be sure. And yet, wherein shall we say that it differed in quality from those long scrolls of fame that list the deeds of those whom we call leaders? For leadership is of the spirit and of the mind. To demonstrate it, whether in the play of youth that time or death cut short, or in the larger play of life, is merely to evidence some inward possession, intangible but eternal. Place an army in a field, seat a company around a table, crowd a room with dancers, scatter lads about the yard of a school—it is always the same: someone shows a spirit that compels, and him the others follow. If he leads into some new realm of the mind, we call him a philosopher. If he mounts to some clear height of beauty, we call him poet, artist, master-singer. If the strange magnet of his soul draws men across some blasted field to hillside deep with dead, we call him a great general. Why shall we not deem him a leader, though a lad, who has that same possession and misses his goal on earth merely because his body would not bear the mind?

ADAIR PLEASANTS ARCHER.

"The Gentleman Unafraid."

We read in the daily press, "On October 6 at Camp Grant, Ill. SERGEANT ADAIR PLEASANTS ARCHER of pneumonia." To those who knew him not, the words simply mean one more life laid down in the Great Sacrifice, but to those of us who knew him, we realize the world will never be quite the same again, with so much sweetness, beauty, bravery, love and joy gone out of it, with the passing of this pure young soul. A more worthy pen than mine should tell of this young soldier and his sacrifice, but I fain would lay my poor tribute at his feet, those feet so swift and eager to do a kindness, and ever found on the Highway of the King. Endowed with beauty of body to such a degree as is seldom seen, still the soul beauty was even more wonderful, truth, loyalty and love of service shone through his eyes to all beholders, and knowing who his Captain was, we felt his longing was to "serve Him so faithfully in his daily duty that some day he would hear Him calling him friend." Little we dreamed by soon that "some day" was to come. Life for Adair seemed scarcely started, life that he ever regarded "not as a cup to be drained, but as a measure to be filled," filled with beautiful acts. Such acts as our "Gentleman Unafraid" daily performed the last six weeks of his life, when, put in charge of a development company he spent his unusual talents trying to give joy and understanding to those poor, poor soldiers to whom their new and strange surroundings were a baffling mystery that they could not comprehend. France has her heroes by the hundred thousand lying there, but perhaps the heroes who died for the cause here are just as great, indeed greater, for there was no excitement for them, just the daily performance of hard and monotonous tasks with a smile and a cheer. His country called, that was enough for him.

"His youth and self forgotten

When the great summons came,
Does he know to-day a thousand throats
Choke as they speak his name?"

If we listen closely and look with eyes that see the unseen, it will not be hard for us to see our hero boy, with head erect, gazing at his Supreme Commander as he answers his last roll call, and hear his clear voice saying, "Ready to live of you, or die for you, Christ, I am here." And in His keeping we leave him, with a heart of gratitude that once he walked with us.

With the "Blue Triangle."

"Cafard"—that blue war-weariness which sometimes attacks even the cheeriest of people, recently settled on a little French woman in one of the Y. W. C. A. foyers in France. She was usually the gayest, the most spontaneously merry entertainer in the foyer, but this day was an anniversary—the sad anniversary of her husband's death, from a wound received four years ago during the first month of the war.

Madame tried to forget, but the cafard had its way and she slipped off in a corner to shed the tears that could not be driven back. There one of the Blue Triangle girls found her, and tried as best she could to cheer the little madame, to tell her how great was the sympathy and admiration of all America for the remarkable courage of the French under their heavy burden. Madame smiled a brave little smile, straightened up, and threw a moist handkerchief into the corner.

"Voila, C'est tout," she said, and walked off. The next time the Blue Triangle hostess saw madame she was the center of a large group who had magically thrown off their own gloom and were applauding vociferously. Madame was the magic. She had started the victrola, and was dancing for them with all the inimitable grace and infectious gaiety characteristic of the French.

Miss Willie R. Young, a Y. W. C. A. secretary at one of the base hospitals in France, where she looks after the welfare of our Red Cross nurses, writes:

"A sixteen-year-old boy, with both feet shot off, was wheeled in to hear Dr. Harry E. Fosdick the other night, and with shining eyes listened as I never saw anybody listen. When Dr. Fosdick had finished his "Challenge of the Present Crisis," the boy looked down at his stumps and then at Dr. Fosdick and burst out:

"Gee, I'm glad it was that part of me and not the top that got bursted up!"

Dr. Fosdick looked down at the pale face with the big eyes and said:

"You bet, for the man is all there!"

"American nurses have been putting on dressings for boys with legs and arms gone, and with gas burns which threaten the eyesight, with just that kind of spirit for weeks. Only those who live with those girls can know the strain on heart and body."

Miss Young is one of the secretaries sent to France by the Y. W. C. A. to establish huts for the American Red Cross nurses.

Personal Notes

The Rev. G. Moseley Murray, rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, Baltimore, has resigned and retired from active parochial work. The Rev. Walter B. Stehl, rector of the Church of the Holy Innocents, will succeed Mr. Murray as rector, and expects to take charge shortly. Mr. Murray will continue the afternoon services for soldiers and sailors.

The address of the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, is changed from Lynchburg, Va., to 709 Stockley Gardens, Norfolk, Va.

Lieutenant Lester Wallace Kearn, of New York, who was recently killed in France, was a candidate for Holy Orders, being a student at St. Stephen's College, Annandale, N. Y., before enlisting as a private in the 106th Infantry. He was promoted last July.

The Rev. Elmer C. Pedrick has entered upon his duties as assistant to the Rev. Dr. Niver, rector of Christ Church, Baltimore. Mr. Pedrick, who has been in charge of Trinity Church, Fredericksburg, Va., was advanced to the priesthood on St. Luke's Day.

The Rev. G. Wallace Martin, of Tamaqua, Pa., has accepted a call to St. Paul's Church, Montrose, Pa., and expects to take charge November 1.

Former Governor Prince, of New Mexico, who experienced a physical breakdown about three months ago, is still confined to the house and unable to attend to business of any sort. Governor and Mrs. Prince are now at Flushing, N. Y., where he can be under hospital care.

The Rev. Wyllis Rede has taken charge of the Church of the Epiphany, Baltimore, in succession to the Rev. C. E. Harding, recently resigned, after a long rectorship.

Bishop Whitehead, of Pittsburgh, is now convalescing at the West Penn Hospital, Pittsburgh, where he underwent an operation recently.

The Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., rector of St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis, Minn., at the request of Secretary of War Baker, is visiting the great army encampments.

Ordination.

On Monday, October 14, in the Chapel of the Holy Spirit, Harrisburg, the Rev. Dwight Benton, Jr., was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Darlington, acting for the Bishop of Pittsburgh. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Floyd Appleton, Ph. D., and the sermon was by the Rev. Leroy F. Baker. Mr. Benton has been appointed to the Episcopal work at the Mt. Alto Sanatorium and Emanuel Chapel, Mt. Alto, and will enter upon his work immediately.

Deaths.

The Rev. Edward Stuart Hale, rector of St. David's Church, Manayunk, Pa., died of pneumonia on Thursday, October 17, at the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia. Funeral services were held on October 21 and burial was in St. David's churchyard.

The Rev. Millidge Walker, priest of the Diocese of Connecticut, died on Sunday, October 6, at Richland, N. J., aged sixty-seven years. Interment was at St. James the Less, Philadelphia, October 8.

All Saints' Day.

All Saints' Day is the day set aside by the Church for the commemoration of her sainted dead. And when we say that it is the day which belongs to the saints of the Church, we do not mean that it belongs to a few select and perfect ones. In the Bible the term saint is applied to all believers, to all the disciples of Jesus. St. Paul addresses his letters to "the Saints that are in Ephesus," "to the Saints that are at Philippi," etc., meaning the members of the Christian Church in those places. He says of himself, "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect, but I follow after," "I press toward the mark." Neither do we mean that the day belongs to the early Christians. It belongs to those of all ages who humbly followed in the footsteps of the Master. It belongs to the believer, the follower of Jesus who passed into Paradise last week, as truly as it belongs to St. Paul, who passed into Paradise 1,900 years ago. As the people of this nation came together on a certain day to remember their dead, and as the people of the Confederacy gather at our cemeteries to remember their dead and to strew their graves with flowers, so on All Saints' Day Christian people come together in the house of the Lord to commemorate all those who in the great army of the Lord, in the great fight of faith, have finished their course and rest from their labors. They come not only to commemorate, but to offer praise and thanksgiving to Him who has saved them from the power of death, who has washed them in His own blood and set them in heavenly places. Nay, more than that. They come to celebrate "The Communion of Saints," which is the unity, the solidarity, the inseparable bond between the Christians of the Church on earth and the Christians of the Church in Paradise—the assurance that after a temporary separation all shall be united in the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ.—Robert S. Copeland, in Trinity Record.

Faith and patience must accompany each other in suffering times. Patience is the soul's shoulder to bear what is afflictive at present; faith is the Christian's eye to discover a glorious deliverance to come; where no patience is it is a token of no faith; and where no faith is there will appear great impatience.—W. Burkitt.

TRY THIS FOR YOUR HEALTH.

For diseases which do not readily yield to treatment, such as chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, rheumatism, Bright's disease, gall stones, uric acid poisoning, and diseases of the kidney and liver, the best physicians send their wealthy patients to the famous mineral springs. Some even spent months at the Spas of Europe and were almost invariably cured or greatly benefited.

I believe that the Shivar Spring is the greatest mineral spring ever discovered and I believe it so firmly that I offer to send you enough water for a three weeks' treatment (two five-gallon demijohns) on my guarantee that if it fails to benefit your case I will refund the price. You would hardly believe me if I told you that only about two out of a hundred, on the average, say that they have received no benefit. The water is restoring thousands. It restored my thought my case was incurable and I am willing and anxious for you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocketbook. If I win you become a life friend of the Spring. If I lose I will be sorry for you, but I will appreciate your courtesy in giving the water a trial and will gladly refund your money on request. Sign the following letter:

Shivar Spring,
Box 64-E, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Water. I agree to give it a fair trial in accordance with instructions contained in the booklet you will send, and if I report no benefit, you agree to refund the price of the water in full on receipt of the two empty demijohns which I agree to return within thirty days.

NOTE:—"I have had the pleasure of serving the little church at Shivar Spring as Pastor for years, and am therefore well acquainted with Mr. Shivar and his associates, whom I gladly commend as honorable business men and worthy of the confidence of the public. I have personally derived great benefit from the use of the Shivar Mineral Water and have knowledge of its beneficial effects in a great number and variety of cases."—Rev. A. McCa. Pittman.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

All love asks is the privilege of doing its best.

It costs more to be proud than it does to be generous.

Treasure laid up in heaven always enriches somebody on earth.

If I am not happy in the will of God, I can be happy in nothing else.

When love gives, it enriches itself, but what covetousness keeps, it takes from itself.

Those who love the Lord Jesus Christ never see each other for the last time.—E. B. Browning.

God's love for poor sinners is very wonderful, and so is God's patience with ill-natured saints.

The greatest prosperity that a man can have from God is the gift of a heart that loves to give.

One reason why God does not use some people is because they are not willing for Him to use their money.

There is no limit whatever to the grace promised; let there be no limit to our hope of receiving it.—Selected.

Folks that get weary in well-doing generally haven't done much at it, when you come to hunt up their records. The weariness is usually at the beginning.

Kind looks, kind words, kind acts and warm hand-shakes—these are secondary means of grace when men are in trouble, and are fighting their unseen battles.

The thought of our immortality should be more awake, alive, stimulating in our minds, more than latent, not merely in the conviction of our understanding, but ardently ever in our heart. We should make it often the subject of our cheerful, thankful meditation.

If when in your endeavor to achieve a high purpose you meet with misunderstanding and apparent defeat, let your solace be found in the memory of Him whose mission on earth culminated in Calvary.

The spiritual mind develops not so much by study and meditation as by obedience. No man by searching can find out God, yet the weakest of us, by walking in His ways, may know Him and love Him.

To be found making the most of what He has lent, be it much or little; to be found trimming the lamp, whether it burn with a faint or with a brilliant flame; this is the concern of love.—Rev. H. P. Liddon, D. D.

Only thy restless heart keep still,
And wait in cheerful hope, content
To take what'er His gracious will,
His all-descending Love hath sent,
Nor doubt our inmost souls all known
To Him who chose us for His own.

To live rightly we must turn our faces forward, and press forward, and not look backward morbidly for the footsteps in the dust of those beloved ones who traveled with us but yesterday. They themselves are not behind but before, and we carry with us our tenderness, living and undiminished towards them, to be completed when the round of this life is complete for us also.—Elizabeth Browning.

Men need inspiring. They grapple with the temptations and the hardships of life at such close quarters that sometimes they lose the larger vision and forget that God is always on the side of right. Blessed is the man, then, who can make them lift their eyes to the far-off hills whence help cometh, who can put into their hearts the courage of a new hope and the joy of a new faith.—Exchange.

Why should not those who are gone be actually nearer us, not farther from us, in the heavenly world, praying for us, and it may be influencing and guiding us in a hundred ways of which we, in our prison house of mortality, cannot dream? Yes! Do not be afraid to believe that he whom you have lost is near you, and you near him, and both of you near God, who died on the cross for you.—Charles Kingsley.

Dying at His Post of Duty.

By Nolan R. Best.

Rev. Walter Rue Murray, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Holmsburg, Philadelphia, whose death has been reported from France by cable, was a victim of the terrific artillery fire—said to be the worst barrage of the war—which the Germans laid down when they attempted on July 5 to advance from the line of the Marne. Mr. Murray was serving as a Y. M. C. A. worker with a regiment which included several boys out of his own church, and a still larger number from the membership of his Bible class.

Like all other Y men stationed along the American fighting front in France, Mr. Murray chose, when the battle test came, to "stay with the boys." With them in their dugouts he kept watch all through the terrible Sunday night when the Huns were shelling American trenches preparatory to their grand assault. When daylight broke he left shelter and hurried to the dressing station, where the wounded were being carried in by the stretcher-bearers in numbers decidedly staggering to men who had never been under fire before. But Mr. Murray was not staggered; cheerfully and steadily he lent a hand as men were carried to the operating table and carried away again. If he had been content with this service alone, however, he would probably have escaped with his life, notwithstanding the constant shell-fire falling on the old farmhouse where the surgeons were at work. But Mr. Murray remembered meanwhile that there had been no chance at all of serving any sort of breakfast to the unwounded men still fighting on the front line, and he began to figure how he could get up to these soldiers the stock of cookies and chocolate he had in his canteen. He soon decided to set up an open canteen under an apple tree across the road, where he could pass out to couriers and ammunition drivers as they went up toward the front, packs of these "eats" for their comrades in the trenches.

After that he divided his time for several hours between the wounded lying in the hovel and the unwounded who stopped by at the apple tree. It was near noon when finally he stepped out of the dressing station door to cross over once more to his stock of "goodies." The shelling seemed to have abated, and he probably regarded himself as being practically safe again after the perils of the night and morning. But as he walked into the road a German shell exploded almost at his feet. The friends who rushed to him as he fell found him wounded only in the arm, and assumed that his injuries were minor. But ten minutes later, as he lay among the boys in the old farm building where he had been serving cheerfully all morning, the pastor's gallant heart suddenly stopped. Shock had killed him.

For tribute to his memory nothing perhaps could be more eloquent than the unconventional eulogy paid Mr. Murray by three soldiers from his unit who hailed an eminent Association leader driving by their camp and asked if he knew their "Y" man who was killed in the last battle. The official replied that he was sorry to say he had not know Mr. Murray. The spokesman of the boys answered with slow emphasis and manifest feeling.

"Well, sir, you surely missed the finest man you ever knew. There wasn't any religion about him at all; whether you were Protestant or Catholic or a Jew, you were all just the same to him. He took up with everybody just alike. There was something about him that just pulled everybody—made you want to be decent, you know. No, sir, you'll never get another like him for this bunch."

In the armies of our great nations, while desertion is punished with heavy penalties, retirement is allowed under certain conditions. There is an army, however, in which retirement is never sanctioned—not even in the case of the oldest veteran; and, addressing the soldiers of that army, the apostle writes.

"Having done all, to stand. Stand therefore."—S. Martin.

"To help make strong, keen, red-blooded Americans there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. Nuxated Iron often increases the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, run-down people in two weeks' time. It is now being used by over three million people annually, including such men as Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, formerly Secretary of the Treasury and ex-Governor of Iowa; former United States Senator and Vice Presidential nominee, Charles A. Towne; General John L. Clem (Retired), the drummer boy of Shiloh, who was sergeant in the U. S. Army when only 12 years of age; also United States Judge G. W. Atkinson of the Court of Claims of Washington and others. Nuxated Iron is dispensed by all good druggists everywhere.

"Among So Many."

We do not even know his name,
His lineage, or his age,
And yet he lives in deathless fame
Upon the Gospel page.

The people round the Master press'd,
The sick, the poor, the sad;
He stands distinct from all the rest,
A little fisher lad.

We cannot guess what prompts his thought
That those five loaves he brings;
The fish he may himself have caught
He carries on his strings.

He waits with patient, upraised head,
The hungry crowd he sees;
The fish are here, the barley bread,
And yet what use are these?

Still, all he has his Lord may take,
And then it must be well—
The Master took, and blessed, and brake,
And wrought His miracle!

O, glad child heart, so sure and swift
The perfect way to choose;
O, happy hands that bore the gift
The Master deigned to use!

Too often we some gracious deed
In faithless doubt withhold;
"Too poor the means, too vast the need,"
We cry, like those of old.

Yet he who gives with generous will,
And childlike zeal imbued,
Finds that the store suffices still
To feed Christ's multitude.

We lose the lad amid the throng,
No more of him we know,
Nor if his life were short or long,
Nor what its joy or woe.

Only in one recorded place
The veil is backward cast.
To let that innocent, boyish face
Smile on us from the past.

Thus to an age of noisy claims
One lesson more is given:
The fair deeds live, the actors' names
Are only known in heaven.
—Christian Burke.

The Child Taken.

When one comes to the loss of young children—a sad perplexity—let it not be forgotten that they were given. If in the hour of bitterest grief it were asked of a bereaved mother whether she would prefer never to have possessed in order that she might never have lost, her heart would be very indignant. No little child has ever come from God and stayed a brief while in some human home—to return again to the Father—without making glad that home and leaving behind some trace of heaven. A family had counted themselves poorer without those quaint sayings, those cunning caresses, that soft touch, that sudden smile. This short visit was not an incident: it was a benediction. The child departs, the remembrances, the influence, the associations remain. If one should allow us to have Sarto's Annunciation for a month, we should thank him: when he

Teach Me, Lord.

Teach me to love the world as Thou dost love,
Ready to give my dearest and my best,
Than self more dear, to save it from its sins,
And turn all hearts to Thee. Oh! grant the faith
In Thy beloved Son, Thy holy Lamb,
Which wakes, within, the sleeping life of love,
And makes us one with Him who died that men
Might share His life eternal, and might dwell
In Thee, from whose exhaustless fullness all
Who look to Thee in fervent prayer receive Thy Spirit's bounteous gift. But from that love
Which clings in fondness to the world's bad ways,
And sinks the soul in its corrupting guile,
Save me, O God; for earth must pass away,
Ambitious pride, and all the idle glare
Of social rank, and wealth's delusive charm.
That which we see is temporal, and soon
Must yield to time's corrosive touch, and sink
To dark oblivion. But the things unseen,
Love, holiness and truth, eternal stand
Before Thy glorious throne, and speak Thy word
Within the heart of man. To that blest word
Be all my powers subdued, that I may still Show forth Thy love which quickens and redeems.

—James Drummond.

Christian Stewardship.

Religion if it is worth anything to us is worth everything.

That any worth-while of it must show in our money values as well as in other ways.

That the only true way of making our "money talk" for our real value of our religion is the Bible and Church way of looking upon all we have as held under a stewardship from God with a stable and sensitive return to Him as some "honor bound" part of it.

That thus it must become a matter of percentage of wage or income rather than a "petty cash business" covering leavings after every other way of spending has been met.

That so it behooves every Christian man and woman who really believes religion of any value to sit down and figure out wage or income, to see what percentage of that they are willing to conscientiously fix as spoken for their "debt of honor" to God and to adopt some method of regular settlement of it in His work.—Bishop Nichols.

NEXT: THE UNITED WAR-WORK CAMPAIGN.

The Fourth Liberty Loan is now a thing-accomplished, another big undertaking thoroughly well performed. Again the American people have registered their determination that the war shall be fought to a finish, cost what it may. As a nation we have every right to feel gratified at the success of the Loan under circumstances which might well have prevented its complete achievement had the people been less united or less resolute. We may put it behind us with a feeling of satisfaction and of confidence in our ability to meet every demand in so great a cause; and say, what is to be done next?

The answer is ready to hand. Next is the United War-Work Campaign, to begin on November 11 and to last one week; within which time we are asked, not to loan but to give, over $170,500,000 to the seven great patriotic organizations which are working for the welfare and morale of the men, and women, too, who are fighting this war for us.

As our readers are aware the seven organizations united in this drive, and the sums nominally asked for each, are the Young Men's Christian Association, $100,000,000; the Young Women's Christian Association, $15,000,000; the National Catholic War Council (working especially through the Knights of Columbus), $30,000,000; the Jewish Welfare Board, $3,500,000; the War Camp Community Service, $15,000,000; the American Library Association, $3,500,000, and the Salvation Army, $3,500,000. It is also known that the wise plan of one campaign for all these organizations was President Wilson's own. Perhaps no other man would have had the boldness to press such a suggestion; certainly none other could have secured its adoption. It was met in some quarters with quite a storm of indignation and protest from some of the brethren who trembled for the ark of religious freedom and imagined that their theological rectitude would be compromised if they helped a Romanist or a Jew to help his fellow-religionist. Even the open-minded War Council of the Y. M. C. A. were nonplussed for a little while at so broad and liberal a scheme. But they have ceased to apologize for it now, and some of its most strenuous opponents have seen a new light and are giving the President's plan for a united campaign their hearty endorsement. A lengthy statement of Dr. John R. Mott, made before a gathering of the editors of a number of religious papers whom he brought together for a discussion of this matter, is thus epitomized. We wish our space admitted the publication of his speech entire:

"On the special subject of the United War Work Campaign Dr. Mott spoke with perfect frankness. His policy from the first had been to keep the Y. M. C. A. out of mergers, war chests and the like. He had argued the case of an independent campaign before the authorities at Washington with all the skill at his command. But the demand for a united canvass on the war chest plan had arisen in the Chambers of Commerce, Rotary Clubs and State Councils of Defense, and was strongly pressed on the grounds of economy of time, expense and effort. President Wilson, convinced by these arguments and by considerations growing out of his information bearing upon the whole situation, and moved by his solicitude for harmony and unity in the nation, had made a personal request that the seven societies join forces in a common appeal and canvass for funds. An invitation from such a source was not to be disregarded, and all parties had acquiesced in it. It must, however, be remembered that the President has expressly guarded the independence of the several units. He wrote:

"I wish it distinctly understood that their compliance with this request will not in any sense imply the surrender on the part of any of them of its distinctive character and autonomy, because I fully recognize the fact that each of them has its own traditions, principles and relationships which it properly prizes and which, if preserved and strengthened, make possible the largest service."

"The President having settled the matter, Dr. Mott admitted that he had himself come to realize that the advantages of the arrangement outweighed the disadvantages, at least in seven ways: (1) Economy: It will obviously save time and money, and the regular audit of all expenditure will put a check upon extravagance and waste. (2) Efficiency: Already the several organizations were learning valuable lessons from each others' experience. (3) It was enabling the stronger and more experienced agencies to be of service to the weak. (4) It was replacing mutual rivalry and misunderstanding with better feeling." (5) It was promoting the right sort of religious unity. (6) It was cementing that national solidarity which was indispensable to winning the war. (7) It was presenting a rare opportunity for cultivating breadth and largeness of soul. For example, the Jews were breaking through their traditional exclusiveness to enlist their fellow religionists to work for this common cause in an extraordinary manner, and there was every evidence that the other groups would do the same."

On the last two points we must quote Dr. Mott's own words:

"This co-operative plan will promote the solidarity of the nation. I have made five visits to the warring countries since the war began and I think I realize what is involved in this struggle. We are far from the end of it. Well may our hearty stand still this afternoon as an American people when we remind ourselves of the price to be paid by our country before a military victory is achieved, before which there can be no foundation for treaties of peace on a basis of justice which we must have for the maintenance of our ideals and principles. Anything, therefore, which will lead this cosmopolitan nation, this land of many races and of many religions to find its unity, its deep solidarity, and extend it, is in the national interest and in the interest of the cause for which our boys are laying down their lives.

"Were I to mention another advantage of this plan and of its practice it is this, that it opens up boundless opportunities for all of us; opportunities for largeness of soul—how the people will expand under this conception; opportunities for illustrating genuine catholicity of spirit—how rare it is in the world after all; opportunities for exercising the finest leadership in the sense of that sentence in the Bible, 'He who would be greatest among you shall be the servant of all'; boundless opportunities likewise to forget ourselves and to magnify others and to serve. What vistas open up on every hand to expand us and our nation. So I say when the people back home remind you that there are some things that may have caused mental reservations or some difficulties they see in the United Campaign, remind them that difficulties are an added attraction and not without their great advantages."

The sum asked for in this canvass for the great work undertaken is too small for the needs as they appear at present. Such, at least, is the case with the largest and most important organization, the Young Men's Christian Association, and presumably with all the rest. The estimates had to be made months in advance, before it was realized how tremendously the need would grow with the expansion of the army and navy. When the data was collected and the various budgets approved by the War Department they were based on the expectation of three millions and a half of men under arms by next summer. The estimate is now four millions eight hundred thousand. Then it was supposed that we would have a million men overseas by this time. Already we have two millions across and have another million awaiting transportation. The balance of interest and work has shifted from this side of the Atlantic to the other, with a tremendous increase of cost. The men over there are not massed in a dozen or so great cantonments, but are to a great extent billeted in comparatively small detachments in numberless towns and villages and are frequently changing their locations as military exigencies demand. The Y. M. C. A. hut or canteen must follow them, must be in every place where even small bodies of our men are, and must find their own means of transportation. The conception of the great expense involved, as well as of the imperative need, grows upon us as we think of it until it surpasses our grasp. Think, too, of the growth of the navy. When we entered the war we had two hundred ships in active service; by January we will have two thousand. Then we had 70,000 men in the naval forces, now over half a million. These must also be served. Then there are other millions in the shipbuilding yards, the arsenals and other militarized industries. The great army of women and girls working in so many places and capacities must also be looked after with special solicitude—the work particularly of the Young Woman's Christian Association. Moreover, the armies and workers of our Allies ought to share largely in the ministrations of these agencies of ours, and will if sufficient means are provided.

It is obvious, then, that the sum of $170,500,000 apportioned among the communities of our country is all too small to meet the needs. It ought to be considered only as the most insufficient minimum, a mere starting point for the excess of our actual contributions. Let us bear in mind as we prepare for and try to do our part in this campaign, what the work of these Associations mean to the millions of America's bravest and best engaged in this great crusade, and give with a deep sense of gratitude for the opportunity. Says Dr. Mott:

"These societies are to be the American home to every boy. That is enough on which to stake the whole argument. They also must be the American school and the American college. To this end we have just started the American university in khaki. We must likewise be the American club at its best for all these boys, and the American library, and the American stage at its best, and the American churches and synagogues. In a sentence, we seek to reproduce for our soldiers and sailors—remember this—all that is best in American life. This is costly, but none too costly. Why, $170,500,000 will mean about ten cents a day for each American soldier, and that does not include the navy, nor the women affected by war conditions. That does not include our Allies. We ought to increase the average amount for the soldiers and sailors alone to at least fifteen cents a day, and, of course, the American people will do it when they understand."

Since the above was written we learn from the daily press that with President Wilson's full approval the amount to be asked for in the War Work Campaign will be $250,000,000. This is as it ought to be, but it will mean a more earnest campaign and more liberal giving. The latter waits only upon the former. "The American people will do it when they understand."

A correspondent writes to suggest that the series of papers on "Familiar Hymns" and also Dr. Wilmer's papers on "The New Table of Lessons" be published in book form. The suggestion is respectfully referred to the authors of these articles.

Christus Consolator.

Beside the dead I knelt for prayer
And felt a presence as I prayed;
Lo! it was Jesus standing there,
He smiled: "Be not afraid!"

"Lord, Thou hast conquered death,
we know,
Restore again to life," I said,
"This one who died an hour ago."
He smiled: "He is not dead!"

"Asleep, then, as Thyself didst say,
Yet Thou canst lift the lids that keep
His prisoned eyes from ours away."
He smiled: "He does not sleep!"

"Nay, then, tho' haply he do wake
And look upon some fairer dawn;
Restore him to our hearts that ache!"
He smiled: "He is not gone!"

"Alas, too well we know our loss,
Nor hope again our joy to touch
Until the stream of death we cross."
He smiled: "There is no such!"

"Yet our beloved seem so far,
The while we yearn to feel them near,
Albeit with Thee we trust they are."
He smiled: "And I am here!"

"Dear Lord, how shall we know that they Still walk unseen with us and
Thee,
Nor sleep, nor wander far away?"
He smiled: "Abide in Me!"
—R. W. Raymond.

My own experience is that the Bible is dull when I am dull. When I am really alive, and set in upon the text with a tidal pressure of living affinities, it opens, it multiplies discoveries, and reveals depths even faster than I can note them. The worldly spirit shuts the Bible; the Spirit of God makes it a fire, flaming out all meanings and glorious truths.—H. Bushnell.

Here and There

A peaceful event which in ordinary times would have attracted wide attention throughout the country has been accomplished almost unnoticed. That is the driving of the last spike in the Government railroad in Alaska. This line is about five hundred miles long and extends in the interior of Alaska, making accessible coal deposits which will supply fuel for the whole Pacific coast. When we remember that this country paid the insignificant sum of $7,500,000 to Russia for this immensely valuable territory, and that Secretary Seward was laughed at by the whole nation for negotiating the deal, we cannot but wonder if he may not be smiling today with self-satisfaction somewhere in the spirit world.

The allied world today stands as greatly indebted to the diplomatic genius of Woodrow Wilson as it does to the military skill of Marshal Foch. When the Kaiser sent his first note asking for an armistice, he undoubtedly expected one of two replies; either a prompt refusal, in which case he could have gone before the German people as a rebuffed peacemaker; or else an agreement to an armistice, which would have enabled him to get his armies on to German soil and begin a new "war of defense." Mr. Wilson was shrewd enough to avoid both of these traps, and finally to deliver the German negotiators, bound hand and foot in their own promises, to the allied military authorities to receive from them the terms of an armistice. To be sure a German promise is not a very strong bond, but when backed by French and British guns and American soldiers it becomes strengthened to a degree which spells "unconditional surrender."

The enormity of the catastrophe which befell Minnesota from the disastrous effects of the recent forest fires is not thoroughly realized by the people of the East, to whom a forest fire is more an object of curiosity than of real danger. A private letter from one who traversed the devastated region in Northern Minnesota shortly after the flames had done their dreadful work there tells of passing on the roadside the wreckage of no less than thirty-five automobiles, which, with their occupants, had been overtaken and consumed by the fire. The wind blew at the rate of from eighty to ninety miles an hour and carried the conflagration with it at this pace, so that escape even in the fastest automobile became impossible. Whole villages were entirely wiped out. The loss of life exceeded one thousand. No estimate of the loss of property has yet been procurable.

The one man in Germany whose promise might be considered worth anything is Karl Liebknecht, the Socialist leader, who refused to be intimidated by the Militarists at the opening of the war and was consequently put in jail. After spending four years in prison he has been set free within the past few weeks. Now the report comes that Bavarian Socialists are demanding a republic with Liebknecht at its head. Such a government might be worthy of a place in the League of Nations, for this leader, alone of all the Germans, has proved his sincerity in opposition to the war by submitting to four long years in prison rather than retract or violate his principles.

The important Turkish town of Aleppo, which has just been occupied by General Allenby, might well be called the "City of Gardens." It lies seventy miles east of the Mediterranean Sea on the edge of the great Syrian desert.
